Straight talk on Cream Separators by

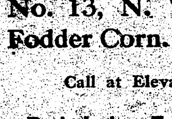
Carlson Mercantile Company, Inc. Holt, Minnesota.

USERS of De Laval Cream Separators have carried away every first prize awarded at conventions of the National Creamery Buttermakers' Association since their first meeting in 1892. The record is unbroken!

The reason is that De Laval bowl design, together with low speed, enables the delivery of butter-fat globules unbroken and in their natural condition—thus insuring better butter.

Because of its close skimming the De Laval produces more cream, which means more butter.

Thus the user of a De Laval Separator gets both more and better butter.



Come in and let us demonstrate the De Laval

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which said default said Power of Sale has become operative; and the Assignee of the Mortgage hereinafter named is authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and it hereby does declare said sum due, which mortgage was executed by Gustaf Peterson and Nettie Peterson, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated September 13th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 18th day of September, A. D., 1920 at 8:30 o'clock A. M., in Book 92 of Mortgages, on page 298;

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment dated July 30th, A. D., 1923 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota on the 17th day of February 1926 at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages on page 443;

And whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage, on February 20th, 1926, paid delinquent taxes on the mortgaged property hereinafter described in the sum of Seventy-two and 24—100 Dollars ($72.24), and whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage has elected and hereby does elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Three Thousand Dollars ($3000.00), with accumulated interest from the 13th day of September 1923 at the rate of six per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise, to recover the debt, or any part thereof;

NOW, THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the following described premises, included in and covered by said mortgage, the balance of said premises described in said mortgage having heretofore been released from the lein of said mortgage, viz:

Northwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter (NW1-4—SW1-4), and Southwest Quarter of the Northwest Quarter (SW1-4 NW1-4), of Section Thirty-six (36), in Township One Hundred Fifty-six (156) North, of Range Forty-three (43) West of the Fifth P. M., in Marshall County and State of Minnesota,

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County at the Front door of the County Court House, in the city of Warren, in said County and State, on the 19th day of April 1926 at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest and the sum of $72.24 for taxes paid on said premises, with interest from date of payment, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Fifty Dollars attorney fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure. Dated February 20th, 1926.

PLUMMER MAN FOR CONGRESS

Marius Waldal, State Representative, Seeks Republican Nomination.

MARIUS WALDAL, Plummer.

St. Paul, Feb. 25.—Rep. Marius Waldal, Plummer, Red Lake county, today filed as candidate for the Republican nomination for congress in the 9th congressional district.

He will be opposed by Lewis Renshoff, editor of the Detroit [Minn.] Record.

F. H. Peterson, Moorhead, and C. G. Selvig, superintendent of the Northwest School at Crookston, also may file, it is reported.

Rep. Marius Waldal has served two terms in the state house of representatives. He is a farmer and a graduate of the University of Minnesota school of agriculture.

He was largely instrumental in bringing about the adoption of the bill giving the University of Minnesota board of regents one representative from each congressional district, and has served as member of the committees on motor vehicle taxation, markets and marketing, and as chairman of the committee on immigration and state development.—St. Paul Daily News.

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgagee hereinafter named is authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and payable and he hereby does declare the said sum due and payable, which mortgage was executed by Ole J. Moen, a single man, Mortgagor, to Deposit Bank of Winona, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated June 7th 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota on the 11th day of June, A. Carried 55,621,515 Passengers In Eight Years Without Fatal Injury.

St. Paul, Minn.—On January 31, the Great Northern Railway completed its eighth successive year without a single fatal injury to a passenger riding upon its trains. During that eight-year period 55,621,515 passengers were carried for an average distance of 90 miles each. So far as is known this record never has been equalled on any railway of similar size in any country in the world.

Several of the larger American roads, however, have 100 per cent records for carrying passengers four to six successive years without any fatal injuries.

82 VOTES CAST AT VILLAGE ELECTION

Only Four Registered Voters Failed To Vote

An unprecedented number of votes—82 in all—was cast at the village election held Tuesday. This is 4 less than the total number of registered voters. The large vote was caused by a stiff rivalry for the office of President of Council. R. A. Holmgren, whose name appeared on the ticket, was opposed by Mrs. Racine Olson. When the votes were counted it was found that there was a 38-38 tie between the two. Five ballots had been cast on which no mark had been made for President, and one vote went to Racine Olson.

The three judges of election had quite a time settling the deadlock, so lot was resorted to. Lady Luck seemed to favor R. A. Holmgren. Consequantly he was announced as the winning candidate for President of the Council.

The other officers were chosen with only little opposition. They are as follows:

For Clerk
Geo. Fricker
For Treasurer
A. L. Carlson
For Trustee (3 Years)
G. Sanoden
For Trustee (2 Years)
C. L. Sandberg
For Justice of Peace (2 Years)
O. J. Backlund
For Constable (2 Years)

Better Farm Equipment Week Program,
March 15th to 20th, by
C. Gustafson & Son,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

Tuesday, the 16th.—Special Barn Equipment Day. Also demonstrations of different machines.

At 2 o'clock p. m. of this day Mr. W. A. Zaloudek, vice-president of the Hudson Mfg. Co. will give a talk on "Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow". Don't miss this. It's good.

Wednesday, the 17th.—Special Tractor and Power Farming Day. The boys of the International Harvestor Company in charge. At 12 o'clock, noon, a FREE LUNCH, consisting of baked beans, sandwiches, doughnuts, pickles, and coffee, will be served to all farmers and their families, as well as to all others interested in better Farm Equipment.

At 2 o'clock, Mr. F. R. Fields, one of the managers of the International Harvester Co., will give a short talk. His subject will be "Here and There Farming". Mr. Fields has been around a great deal, and because of this experience is able to give a talk that is intensely interesting.

3 o'clock. Talk: "Power and Dairy Farming" by Mr. O. A. Lingholm. Mr. Lingholm conducted the tractor schools here the last two years, and to many needs no introduction. He will have something to tell you that you will appreciate.

Thursday, the 18th.—On this day we wish to show you all the stock we have on hand at our Soo warehouse, and our sample floor and office.

1 o'clock. Talk by Mr. M. L. Bond, field representative of the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., "The Value of Commercial Fertilizer". Also short talks by farmers of the community who have had experience with commercial fertilizer.

Friday, the 19th.—Ladies' Day. Special demonstrations of machines that will interest the women; as, washing machines, cream separators, water systems, barn equipment, incubators, brooders, and any other machinery they wish to have demonstrated.

1:30 p. m. Talk: "The Feeding and Care of Poultry", by Mr. R. J. Rustad of Fargo, N. Dak.

3:30. Free lunch ticket to any lunch room in the city. For ladies who attend the programs.

Saturday, the 20th.—This is the wind-up of the "Better Farm Equipment Week's National Program", but we shall continue our demonstrations. We hope the week will have been well-spent and our visitors pleased.

The speaking program will be held in Salvation Army Hall, across the street from our office, and we extend a special invitation to all farmers and their families. Make it a Farmers' Institute. Come every day if you can.

> HIS FIRST BATTLE
>
> Synopsis—Baree is born in a vast tangle of fallen timber that shuts out the light of day. He is the son of Kazan, the dog, and of Gray Wolf, the blind wolf. He makes the acquaintance of his father and sees sunlight for the first time. He gets the use of his legs.

In a way Baree sensed this. He was not afraid of the owls. He was not afraid of the strange blood-curdling cries they made in the black spruce-tops. But once fear entered into him, and he scurried back to his mother. It was when one of the winged hunters of the air swooped down on a snowshoe rabbit, and the squealing agony of the doomed creature set his heart thumping like a little hammer. He felt in those cries the nearness of that one ever-present tragedy of the wild—death. He felt it again that night when, snuggled close to Gray Wolf, he listened to the fierce outcry of a wolf-pack that was close on the heels of a young caribou bull. And the meaning of it all, and the wild thrill of it all, came home to him early in the gray dawn when Kazan returned, holding between his jaws a huge rabbit that was still kicking and squirming with life.

This rabbit was the climax in the first chapter of Baree's education. It was as if Gray Wolf and Kazan had planned it all out, so that he might receive his first introduction in the art of killing. When Kazan had dropped it, Baree approached the big hare cautiously. The back of Wapoos, the rabbit, was broken. His round eyes were glazed, and he had ceased to feel pain. But to Baree, as he dug his tiny teeth into the heavy fur under Wapoos' throat, the hare was very much alive. The teeth did not go through into the flesh. With puppyish fierceness Baree hung on. He thought that he was killing. He could feel the dying convulsions of Wapoos. He could hear the last gasping breaths leaving the warm body, and he snarled and tugged until finally he fell back with a mouthful of fur. When he returned to the attack, Wapoos was quite dead, and Baree continued to bite and snarl until Gray Wolf came with her sharp fangs and tore the rabbit to pieces. After that followed the feast.

So Baree came to understand that to eat meant to kill, and as other days and nights passed, there grew in him swiftly the hunger for flesh. In this he was the true wolf. From Kazan he had taken other and stronger inheritances of the dog. He was magnificently black, which in later days gave him the name of Kusketa Mohekun—the black wolf. On his breast was a star. His right ear was tipped with white. His tail, at six weeks, was bushy and hung low. It was a wolf's tail. His ears were Gray Wolf's ears—sharp, short, pointed, always alert. His fore-shoulders gave promise of being splendidly like Kazan's, and when he stood up he was like the trace-dog, except that he always stood sidewise to the point or object he was watching. This, again, was the wolf, for a dog faces the direction in which he is looking intently.

One brilliant night, when Baree was two months old, and when the sky was filled with stars and a June moon so bright that it seemed scarcely higher than the tall spruce-tops, Baree settled back on his haunches and howled. It was a first effort. But there was no mistake in the note of it. It was the wolf-howl. But a moment later when Baree slunk up to Kazan, as if deeply ashamed of his effort, he was wagging his tail in an unmistakably apologetic manner. And this again was the dog. If Tusoo, the dead Indian trapper, could have seen him then, he would have judged him by that wagging of his tail. It revealed the fact that deep in his heart—and in his soul, if we can concede that he had one—Baree was dog.

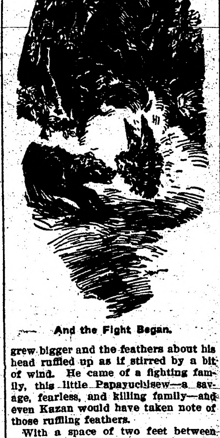
In another way Tusoo would have found judgment of him. At two months the wolf whelp has forgotten how to play. He is a slinking part of the wilderness, already at work preying on creatures smaller and more helpless than himself. Baree still played. In his excursions away from the windfall he had never gone farther than the creek, a hundred yards from where his mother lay. He had helped to tear many dead and dying rabbits into pieces; he believed, if he thought upon the matter at all, that he was exceedingly fierce and courageous. But it was his ninth week before he felt his spurs and fought his terrible battle with the young owl in the edge of the thick forest.

The fact that Oohoomisew, the big snow-owl, had made her nest in a broken stub not far from the windfall was destined to change the whole course of Baree's life, just as the blinding of Gray Wolf had changed hers. The creek ran close past the stub, which had been shriven by lightning; and this stub stood in a still, dark place in the forest, surrounded by tall, black spruce and enveloped in gloom even in broad day. Many times Baree had gone to the edge of this mysterious bit of forest and had peered in curiously, and with a growing desire.

On this day of his great battle its lure was overpowering. Little by little he entered into it, his eyes shining brightly and his ears alert for the slightest sounds that might come out of it. His heart beat faster. The gloom enveloped him more. He forgot the windfall and Kazan and Gray Wolf. Here before him lay the thrill of adventure. He heard stranger sounds, but very soft sounds, as if made by padded feet and downy wings, and they filled him with a thrilling expectancy. Under his feet there were no grass or weeds or flowers, but a wonderful brown carpet of soft evergreen needles. They felt good to his feet, and were so velvety that he could not hear his own movement.

He was fully three hundred yards from the windfall when he passed Oohoomisew's stub and into a thick growth of young balsams. And there—directly in his path—crouched the monster!

Papayuchisew (Young Owl) was not more than a third as large as Baree. But he was a terrifying looking object. To Baree he seemed all head and eyes. He could see no body at all. Kazan had never brought in anything like this, and for a full half minute he remained very quiet, eyeing it speculatively. Papayuchisew did not move a feather. But as Baree advanced, a cautious step at a time, the bird's eyes grew bigger and the feathers about his head ruffled up as if stirred by a bit of wind. He came of a fighting family, this little Papayuchisew—a savage, fearless, and killing family—and even Kazan would have taken note of those ruffling feathers.



And the Fight Began.

With a space of two feet between them, the pup and the owlet eyed each other. In the moment, if Gray Wolf could have seen, she might have said to Baree: "Use your legs—and run!" And Oohoomisew, the old owl, might have said to Papayuchisew: "You little fool—use your wings and fly!" They did neither—and the fight began.

Papayuchisew started it, and with a single wild yelp Baree went back in a heap, the owlet's beak fastened like a red-hot vise in the soft flesh at the end of his nose. That one yelp of surprise and pain was Baree's first and last cry in the fight. The wolf surged in him; rage and the desire to kill possessed him. As Papayuchisew hung on, he made a curious hissing sound; and as Baree rolled and gnashed his teeth and fought to free himself from that amazing grip on his nose, fierce little snarls rose out of his throat.

For fully a minute Baree had no use of his jaws. Then, by accident, he wedged Papayuchisew in a crotch of a low ground-shrub, and a bit of his nose gave way. He might have run then, but instead of that he was back at the owlet like a flash. Flop went Papayuchisew on his back, and Baree buried his needle-like teeth in the bird's breast. It was like trying to bite through a pillow, the feathers were so close and thick. Deeper and deeper Baree sank his fangs, and just as they were beginning to prick the owlet's skin, Papayuchisew—jabbing a little blindly with a beak that snapped sharply every time it closed—got him by the ear.

The pain of that hold was excruciating to Baree, and he made a more desperate effort to get his teeth through his enemy's thick armor of feathers. In the struggle they rolled under the low balsams to the edge of the ravine through which ran the creek. Over the steep edge they plunged, and as they rolled and bumped to the bottom, Baree loosed his hold. Papayuchisew hung valiantly on, and when they reached the bottom he still had his grip on Baree's ear.

Baree's nose was bleeding; his ear felt as if it were being pulled from his head; and in this uncomfortable moment a newly awakened instinct made Baby Papayuchisew discover his wings as a fighting asset. An owl has never really begun to fight until he uses his wings, and with a joyous hissing, Papayuchisew began beating his antagonist so fast and so viciously that Baree was dazed. He was compelled to close his eyes, and he snapped blindly. For the first time since the battle began he felt a strong inclination to get away. He tried to tear himself free with his forepaws, but Papayuchisew—slow to reason but of firm conviction—hung to Baree's ear like grim fate.

At this critical point, when the understanding of defeat was forming itself swiftly in Baree's mind, chance saved him. His fangs closed on one of the owlet's tender feet. Papayuchisew gave a sudden squeak. The ear was free at last—and with a snarl of triumph Baree gave a vicious tug at Papayuchisew's leg.

In the excitement of battle he had not heard the rushing tumult of the creek close under them, and over the edge of a rock Papayuchisew and he went together, the chill water of the rain-swollen stream muffling a final snarl and a final hiss of the two little fighters.

Chapter II

To Papayuchisew, after his first mouthful of water, the stream was almost as safe as the air, for he went sailing down it with the lightness of a gull, wondering in his slow-thinking big head why he was moving so swiftly and so pleasantly without any effort of his own.

To Baree it was a different matter. He went down almost like a stone. A mighty roaring filled his ears; it was dark, suffocating, terrible. In the swift current he was twisted over and over. For twenty feet he was under water. Then he rose to the surface and desperately began using his legs. It was of little use. He had only time to blink once or twice and catch a lungful of air when he shot into a current that was running like a millrace between the butts of two fallen trees, and for another twenty feet the sharpest eyes could not have seen hair or hide of him. He came up again at the edge of a shallow riffle over which the water ran like the rapids at Niagara in miniature, and for fifty or sixty yards he was flung like a hairy ball. From this he was hurled into a deep, cold pool; and then—half dead—he found himself crawling out on a gravelly bar.

For a long time Baree lay there in a pool of sunshine without moving. His ear hurt him; his nose was raw, and burned as if he had thrust it into fire. His legs and body were sore, and as he began to wander along the gravel bar, he was the most wretched pup in the world. He was also completely turned around. In vain he looked about him for some familiar mark—something that might guide him back to his windfall home. Everything was strange. He did not know that the water had flung him out on the wrong side of the stream, and that to reach the windfall he would have to cross it again. He whined, but that was as loud as his voice rose. Gray Wolf could have heard his barking, for the windfall was not more than two hundred and fifty yards up the stream. But the wolf in Baree held him silent, except for his low whining.

Striking the main shore, Baree began going downstream. This was away from the windfall, and each step that he took carried him farther and farther from home. At the end of half an hour Baree would even have welcomed Papayuchisew. And he would not have fought him—he would have inquired, if possible, the way back home.

> Well, Baree, has had his first battle and come out alive. Also, he is lost and homesick. What next?

A Lucky Lie

John Silver was surrounded by friends. And how must friends be entertained? By some sort of story surely. Silver thought for some time, and began:

"I don't know if any of you knew it, but I am going to Mexico next month."

"You are really going to Mexico?"

"And why shouldn't I go to Mexico?" asked Silver.

In the manner of friends they replied:

"Every other man dies of malaria."

"It is simply unbearable with poisonous fleas."

"What's more, Silver, very few people ever come back."

And then Silver exclaimed, heartily:

"Well, it certainly is a lucky thing I was lying!"

Minneapolis—Mrs. J. A. Burnquist, mother of J. A. Burnquist, former governor of Minnesota, died at her home in Dayton, Iowa. Mrs. Burnquist was 82 years old.

St. Paul—J. Harris of Minneapolis, won the state chess championship by defeating Harry Kline, his fellow townsman, in the finals of the Minnesota Chess association tournament at the St. Paul Athletic club.

Moorhead—A subscription of $8,000 to the Lutheran campaign to raise a $500,000 endowment for Concordia College was made at a meeting of the senior class, which has a membership of 65.

Austin—Citizens of Mower county paid tribute to the memory of Mrs. Nancy Clark. Mrs. Clark died at the home of her daughter here, at the age of 102, living in Mower county for 50 years.

Tracy—Forty-eight boy scouts of Tracy edited the Tracy Headlight Herald under the direction of Scout Master William R. Mitchell. They wrote all the news stories for 24 pages.

Mound—78 wild turkeys were liberated from the game refuge at this place. 52 other birds were freed at Belle Plaine, Winona, Rush City and Hinckley. Forebears of these turkeys came from Pennsylvania and Texas.

Appleton—Well drillers on the Hanson farm brought a piece of cedar tree to the surface from a dept of 240 feet. The wood was in a good state of preservation and will be sent to the University of Minnesota for examination.

Minneapolis—About 16,000 additional men will be employed throughout the northwest in the next six weeks when four railroads begin spring maintenance construction work at an estimated cost of $34,000,000.

St. Paul—Otis E. Clymer, former major league baseball player and star outfielder for the Minneapolis baseball team from 1910 to 1912, was fatally injured in an automobile accident at St. Paul.

Le Sueur Center—Twenty-seven Le Sueur county dairy herds yielded an average of 25 pounds of butterfat per cow in January. The average milk production per cow was 93.3 pounds.

Crookston—Actual cost of producing crops on Red River valley farms near here will be determined in a survey of 25 farms by a group of farm experts, headed by Professor George A. Pond of the University of Minnesota.

Winona—A further step to make this section of the state a "sportsman's paradise" has been taken with completion of arrangements for the reception of 460 pairs of Hungarian partridge to be liberated in Winona county about March 20.

St. Paul—A $15,000,000 building and improvement program for 1926 has been announced by the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is one of the largest railroad constructions programs undertaken in recent years. Plans of the Northern Pacific bring expected expenditures by northwest roads this year to more than $50,000,000.

St. Paul—A per capita payment of $50 to the Chippewa Indians of the Red Lake and Consolidated Chippewa agencies in Minnesota was authorized at the interior department. The amount to be distributed to Red Lake Indians totaled $87,500 and that to the consolidated Chippewa agency Indians, $610,600.

St. Paul—Organization of the Minnesota Taxpayers' association, a statewide group of individuals and firms "representative of all classes and financial standings," has been announced. The organization is nonpolitical and Judge T. D. O'Brien of St. Paul is president, J. F. Reed, president of the Minnesota Farm Bureau federation, first vice president; H. Z. Mitchell, editor of the Bemidji Sentinel, second vice president.

Waseca—Waseca county residents are aroused because of numerous personal injury cases, the outgrowth of accidents in Illinois and other outside states, being brought here for trial at the expense of local taxpayers. A number of citizens are urging the return of low verdicts to prevent repetition of the practice.

Duluth—George W. Lorence, former cashier of the People's State bank of Duluth, who confessed to embezzling $83,500 of the bank's funds, pleaded guilty in district court, and was sentenced to serve not more than 10 years on two counts.

Helped by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Cleveland, Ohio.—The friends of Mrs. Helen M. Kowalczyk of 6819 Hope Avenue were glad to hear that she has regained her health. For quite some time Mrs. Kowalczyk was quite ill and it was impossible for her to work. She took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to build her up. After she had started taking it, she wrote to the Pinkham Company as follows: "I certainly boost Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I feel stronger already and sleep sounder. I am very glad to spread the good news of how it has helped me."

Detroit, Michigan.—"I heard of this medicine through an advertisement in the 'Detroit News' and wrote to Mrs. Grace Gillem, whose letter was published. Then I started taking the Vegetable Compound and got the best results. I used the Sanative Wash, too. I am really happy if I can advise women to take your medicines." —Mrs. M. E. Flowers in Desert

It was late February in Arizona, but on the mountainside bloomed several strange and beautiful wild flowers—one a yellow lupine, the common golden pea or buck bean of the West, another the pretty blue covena or brodiaea, also uncomplimentarily known as hog onion. The greatest find of all was a Japanese plant suggesting mimosa, says Nature Magazine, recounting the American Nature association's expedition. The calyx and corolla of the blossoms were so small that the flowers appeared to be merely a group of many stamens about an inch long, white at the base and shading to bright pink. Some one thus called it the bird of paradise flower, but its more common name is fairy.

POP CORN WAYS

Is there any food more appetizing than fresh, tender, well-popped corn seasoned with butter? It is always welcome at any time. Corn to pop well should increase its bulk twenty times. If a wire popper is used for popping hold it far enough away from the heat to avoid burning. The right degree of heat should make good corn pop in a minute and a half. Do not throw away the old bachelors (those that won't pop)—they can be put through a grinder or mill and will make a good breakfast cereal served with top milk. Parched sweet corn is delicious ground and served with milk.

Pop corn is used as a garnish for corn soup. Pop corn with milk makes a delightful supper dish. For those who like chocolate the following will be enjoyed: To two cupfuls of sugar, add one-half cupful of corn sirup, two squares of chocolate grated and one cupful of water. Cook until the sirup hardens in water then pour while hot over four quarts of freshly popped corn; stir well to insure the uniform coating of the kernels.

For sugared corn make a sirup by boiling two cupfuls of sugar and one cupful of water until the sirup hardens in cold water; pour this sirup over six quarts of corn and stir until the grains are well coated.

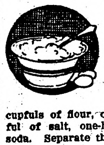
Pop Corn Jack.—This is home-made cracker jack: Take a cupful of molasses, two tablespoonfuls of water, one teaspoonful of vinegar, cook until nearly brittle when tried in water, then add a tablespoonful of butter and a pinch of soda. Stir into four cupfuls of pop corn, adding a handful of shelled peanuts. Stir until all are well covered with the sirup. Puffed rice may be used in place of corn; pour out into a buttered tin to cool, break into squares when cold.

Pop Corn Balls.—Take a pint of molasses, a pint of water, two tablespoonfuls of butter and a teaspoonful of vinegar. Cook till the sirup will harden in cold water, add half teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a teaspoonful of water. Pour over four quarts of popped corn. Stir until the kernels are well covered, then press into balls quickly with buttered hands.

Maple Sugar Pop Corn Balls.—Prepare the sirup using maple sirup or maple sugar just as for pop corn balls; the flavor is especially delightful. Served with maple wax, the children will have a rare treat.

What to Eat.

This is the time of year when waffles for breakfast, waffles for luncheon and waffles for supper are a welcome food.



Waffles.—Of the dozens of waffle recipes which are all good, this is the best, by far: Sift together one and one-fourth cupfuls of flour, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of soda. Separate the whites and yolks of two eggs, beat well, add the egg yolks to one cupful of thick sour milk stir in the sifted flour and other ingredients, add three tablespoonfuls of melted butter and fold in the stiffly beaten whites. Cook on a hot, well-greased waffle iron.

Imitation Pate de Fois Gras.—Cook in separate saucepans in enough water to cover one calf's tongue and one calf's liver and let stand a day in a refrigerator to become cold and firm. Cut the tongue into small triangular pieces to look like truffles. Put the liver through a meat grinder, using the finest knife; repeat the process. Into a large mixing bowl put the chopped liver and add one-fourth its volume in softened butter, working them together until smooth. Now add to the liver paste one tablespoonful of onion juice, one teaspoonful each of made mustard and worcestershire sauce, one-fourth of a teaspoonful each of ground cloves, cayenne pepper, one-half of a nutmeg grated, and salt to taste. Butter the glasses and pack the paste as firmly as possible, mixing the bits of calf's tongue with it. Cover with melted butter and set in the ice box. This will keep for weeks.

Ribbon Salad.—Place a slice of pineapple for each service on lettuce. On the pineapple place sections of orange and grapefruit with membrane removed, in alternating colors, with a strip of red apple unpeeled, between. Serve with any desired dressing.

Corn Dishes.—If we are to be loyal Americans we should at this time try to serve as much corn as possible. Make corn bread, corn gems, corn griddle cakes and corn meal mush. A kettle of well-cooked mush served with good rich milk is a dish which is both wholesome and satisfying. Serve with a few bits of shredded salt codfish for an appetizer and feel that you are pleasantly doing your duty by the corn crop that we are asked to help consume.

Nellie Maxwell.

JELL-O
ORANGE

You don't have to be a French Chef to prepare a tempting Jell-O dessert. By carefully following the recipes in each package anyone can make plain or elaborate desserts and salads. Plain Jell-O dessert takes but a few minutes of your time to prepare and costs little to serve. But perhaps you like elaborate desserts, —and again Jell-O, in combination with fruits, nuts and whipped cream makes a dessert suitable for any occasion. Keep several packages of Jell-O on hand; there are six pure fruit flavors.

Poets and Due Bills

A letter which Edgar Allen Poe wrote apologizing for his inability to repay a loan of $50 has just been sold at auction for $500. This is ten times the amount of the original loan. Thousands of people who are sufferers from constipation do not become aware of it until they seek out the cause of their frequent headaches.

"Those bilious headaches can be prevented"

"I know how agonizing they are. For years I was a chronic sufferer.

"And the headaches were not the worst part of it. The strong drugs I used to take to relieve the pain upset my stomach and slowly but surely undermined my general health.

"Finally I found out that my headaches were due to constipation. My doctor advised Nujol. After taking it regularly a few weeks the trouble disappeared.

"Since then I have never had another headache. There is no reason why I should, for the cause has been corrected."

Nujol Corrects Constipation in Nature's Way

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. Nujol simply softens the waste matter and thus permits regular and thorough elimination without overtaxing the intestinal muscles. Medical authorities approve Nujol because it is gentle, safe and natural in its action.

You can take Nujol for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

Ask your druggist for Nujol today and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

Carlson Mercantile Company, Inc.
Holt, Minnesota.

USERS of De Laval Cream Separators have carried away every first prize awarded at conventions of the National Creamery Buttermakers' Association since their first meeting in 1892. The record is unbroken!

The reason is that De Laval bowl design, together with low speed, enables the delivery of butter-fat globules unbroken and in their natural condition—thus insuring better butter.

Because of its close skimming the De Laval produces more cream, which means more butter.

Thus the user of a De Laval Separator gets both more and better butter.

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which said default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgage hereinafter named is authorised to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and it hereby does declare said sum due, which mortgage was executed by Gustaf Peterson and Nettie Peterson, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated September 13th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 18th day of September, A. D., 1920 at 8:30 o'clock A. M., in Book 92 of Mortgages, on page 298;

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment, dated July 30th, A. D., 1923 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota on the 17th day of February 1926 at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 443;

And whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage, on February 20th, 1926, paid delinquent taxes on the mortgaged property hereinafter described in the sum of Seventy-two and 24—100 Dollars ($72.24), and whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage has elected and hereby does elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Three Thousand Dollars ($3000.00), with accumulated interest from the 13th day of September 1923 at the rate of six per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise, to recover the debt, or any part thereof;

NOW, THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the following described premises, included in and covered by said mortgage, the balance of said premises described in said mortgage having heretofore been released from the lein of said mortgage, viz:

Northwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter (NW1-4—SW1-4), and Southwest Quarter of the Northwest Quarter (SW1-4 NW1-4), of Section Thirty-six (36), in Township One Hundred Fifty-six (156) North, of Range Forty-three (43) West of the Fifth P. M., in Marshall County and State of Minnesota,

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County at the Front door of the County Court House, in the city of Warren, in said County and State, on the 19th day of April 1926 at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest and the sum of $72.24 for taxes paid on said premises, with interest from date of payment, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Fifty Dollars attorney fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure. Obituary of Mrs. M. Olson

Antonette Lunde Olson was born in Preston, Minn., November 5, 1851. She was baptised by Rev. Clausen. Here she spent her girlhood days. She was confirmed by Rev. Larson. In 1877 she was united in marriage to Mathias Olson, who passed away Sept. 17 1913. The young couple lived near Preston for three years, then they moved to Hawley, Minn., to try their luck at homesteading, spending only two years there. Then they homesteaded a farm southeast of Holt. After selling this farm they moved to the farm south of town. Eight children were born to them; namely, Oscar, Amelia, Julius, Martin, John, Alfred, Emma and Otto, all living in this vicinity except Alfred who was killed in the World War. On account of failing eyesight and poor health Mrs. Olson spent the last six years with her daughter, Mrs. Martin Mattson.

On February 1, 1925, she suffered a stroke which partially disabled her left side, From then on she gradually failed in health until she passed away March 11 at 11 o'clock a. m., at the age of 70 years, 4 months and 6 days.

Funeral services were held in the Nazareth Lutheran church Saturday, March 13, Rev. M. B. Ordahl officiating.

Relatives of the deceased who attended the funeral from a distance were:

Theodore Lunde and Mrs. Robert Johnson of Union, N. Dak., a brother and a sister; Mrs. J. Buckman of Crookston, a sister; Mrs. Andrew Olson of Argyle, another sister; and Julius and Oscar Olson of Strathcona, sons of the deceased.

The NEWS extends the deepest sympathy to the relatives of the deceased in their hour of sorrow.

TO EXTEND CORPORATE EXISTENCE.

WHEREAS The Farmers Co-operative Creamery Company was duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of Chapter 3074, General Laws of 1905, for a period of twenty years from February 11, 1907, and

WHEREAS, such corporate existence will expire, unless renewed on February 10th, 1927;

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT HEREBY RESOLVED that this corporation shall and hereby does extend the time of its existence for an additional period of twenty years from and after the 10th day of February 1927.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the officers of this association be—and they hereby are—authorized to prepare and execute the necessary papers in order to extend the duration of this corporation for said additional period of twenty years.

Said resolution was seconded by Carl Johnson, and being put to a vote was unanimously carried.

Dated Feb. 13th, 1926.

All About Nellie Maxwell, A Girl Who Liked To Cook

Nellie Maxwell likes to cook,
She also likes to bake.
She makes a lot of tasty things
From celery soup to cake.
—Modern Rhyme Book.

From celery soup to cake is a long jump in any volume devoted to the culinary art, but Nellie Maxwell knows every page of the way. Being a regular girl, she found a great interest in the always-busy kitchen of her childhood home in a small Wisconsin town. And her mother, being a regular mother, gave Nellie every opportunity to try her hand and perfect her skill in the art of cookery.

That her schooling was thoro and well-directed is shown by the record she has made. For the last eleven years she has given lectures and demonstrations for the University of Wisconsin at the many Farmers' Institutes held in that state. Prior to this she taught domestic science in the state agricultural colleges of Iowa and Nebraska.

Woman readers who have followed Miss Maxwell's suggestions in the Kitchen Cabinet, appearing in the Holt Weekly News, will tell you that her advise is dependable and sound. Turn to it today and see what is offered.

62 Students To Graduate At Northwest Ag. School

Several students from this county who have been attending the Northwest School, Crookston, will receive their diplomas on Thursday, March 25. President L. D. Coffman, of the University of Minnesota, is to give the commencement address on that occasion, which is the 18th annual graduation since the school was established. Sixty-two students will graduate this year.

1926 is the twentieth anniversary of the school and during that time 753 have received diplomas, all but 15 of them during Supt. C. G. Selvig's administration. Several interesting programs feature the commencement exercises which will open on next Sunday evening which all are invited to attend.

Patrons, Attention!

Don't forget to place your order for a Cooling Tank before the weather gets warm. It is communities that have patrons using cooling tanks that produce the best kind of cream during the warm weather.

Cream should be cooled in cold water immediately after separation, both summer and winter. It doesn't take long to cool same if you use a cream stirrer and a pail or two of real cold water. It is the animal heat you want to get out, and it should be gotten out quickly.

The Modern Gait

President Frank H. Alfred of the Pere Marquette line was talking, at a luncheon in Detroit, about the steel-trussed concrete roadways whereon he expects Pere Marquette trains to travel in the future almost with the speed of airplanes.

"We mustn't lag behind. Everything, you know, has speeded up amazingly," Mr. Alfred ended with a smile. "Why, it used to take a young man longer to lay his heart at a girl's feet than it takes the young man of today to be introduced, fall in love, promise, marry, run off with some one else, get divorced and undergo a prison term for nonpayment of alimony."

HOMESICK BAREE

Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half-drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry.

Baree was fully three quarters of a mile from the windfall when he came to a point where the creek split itself into two channels. He had but one choice to follow—the stream that flowed a little south and east. This stream did not run swiftly. It was not filled with shimmering riffles, and rocks about which the water sang and foamed. It grew black, like the forest. It was still and deep. Without knowing it, Baree was burying himself deeper and deeper into Tusoo's old trapping grounds. Since Tusoo had died, they had lain undisturbed except for the wolves, for Gray Wolf and Kazan had not hunted on this side of the waterway—and the wolves themselves preferred the more open country for the chase.

Suddenly Baree found himself at the edge of a deep, dark pool in which the water lay still as oil, and his heart nearly jumped out of his body when a great, sleek, shining creature sprang out from almost under his nose and landed with a tremendous splash in the center of it. It was Nekik, the otter.

The otter had not heard Baree, and in another moment Napanekik, his wife, came sailing out of a patch of gloom, and behind her came three little otters, leaving behind them four shimmering wakes in the oily-looking water. What happened after that made Baree forget for a few minutes that he was lost. Nekik had disappeared under the surface, and now he came up directly under his unsuspecting mate with a force that lifted her half out of the water. Instantly he was gone again, and Napanekik took after him fiercely. To Baree it did not look like play. Two of the baby otters had pitched on the third, which seemed to be fighting desperately. The chill and ache went out of Baree's body. His blood ran excitedly; he forgot himself, and let out a bark. In a flash the otters disappeared. For several minutes the water in the pool continued to rock and heave—and that was all. After a little, Baree drew himself back into the bushes and went on.

It was about three o'clock in the afternoon, and the sun should still have been well up in the sky. But it was growing darker steadily, and the strangeness and fear of it all lent greater speed to Baree's legs. He stopped every little while to listen, and at one of these intervals he heard a sound that drew from him a responsive and joyous whine. It was a distant howl—a wolf's howl—straight ahead of him. Baree was not thinking of wolves but of Kazan, and he ran through the gloom of the forest until he was winded. Then he stopped and listened a long time. The wolf-howl did not come again. Instead of it there rolled up from the west a deep and thunderous rumble. Through the treetops there flashed a vivid streak of lightning. A moaning whisper of wind rode in advance of the storm; the thunder seemed searching Baree out where he stood shivering under a canopy of great spruce. This was his second storm. The first had frightened him terribly, and he had crawled far back into the shelter of the windfall. The best he could find now was a hollow under a big root, and into this he slunk, crying softly. It was a baby-ish cry, cry for his mother, for home, for warmth, for something soft and protecting to nestle up to; and as he cried, the storm burst over the forest.

Baree had never before heard so much noise, and he had never seen the lightning play in such sheets of fire as when this June deluge fell. It seemed at times as though the whole world were aflame, and the earth seemed to shake and roll under the crashes of the thunder. He ceased his crying and made himself as small as he could under the root, which protected him partly from the terrific beat of the rain which came down through the treetops in a flood. It was now so black that except when the lightning ripped great holes in the gloom he could not see the spruce-trunks twenty feet away. Twice that distance from Baree there was a huge dead stub that stood out like a ghost each time the fires swept the sky, as if defying the flaming hands up there to strike—and strike, at last, one of them did! A bluish tongue of snapping flame ran down the old stub; and as it touched the earth, there came a tremendous explosion above the treetops. The massive stub shivered, and then it broke asunder as if cloven by a gigantic ax. It crashed down so close to Baree that earth and sticks flew about him, and he let out a wild yelp of terror as he tried to crowd himself deeper into the shallow hole under the root.

With the destruction of the old stub the thunder and lightning seemed to have vented their malevolence. The thunder passed on into the south and east like the rolling of ten thousand heavy cartwheels over the roofs of the forest, and the lightning went with it. The rain fell steadily. The hole in which he had taken shelter was soppy. He was drenched; his teeth chattered as he waited for the next thing to happen.

It was a long wait. When the rain stopped, and the sky cleared, it was night. Through the tops of the trees Baree could have seen the stars if he had poked out his head and looked upward. But he clung to his hole. Hour after hour passed. Exhausted, half drowned, footsore, and hungry, he did not move. At last he fell into a troubled sleep, a sleep in which every now and then he cried softly and forlornly for his mother. When he ventured out from under the root it was morning, and the sun was shining.

At first Baree could hardly stand. His legs were cramped; every bone in his body seemed out of joint; his ear was stiff where the blood had oozed out of it and hardened, and when he tried to wrinkle his wounded nose, he gave a sharp yap of pain. If such a thing were possible, he looked even worse than he felt. His hair had dried in muddy patches; he was dirt-stained from end to end; and where yesterday he had been plump and shiny, he was now as thin and wretched as misfortune could possibly make him. And he was hungry. He had never before known what it meant to be really hungry.

When he went on, continuing in the direction he had been following yesterday, he slunk along in a disheartened sort of way. His head and ears were no longer alert, and his curiosity was gone. He was not only stomach-hungry: mother-hunger rose above his physical yearning for something to eat. He wanted his mother as he had never wanted her before in his life. He wanted to snuggle his shivering little body close up to her and feel the warm caressing of her tongue and listen to the mothering whine of her voice. And he wanted Kazan, and the old windfall, and that big blue spot that was in the sky right over it. While he followed again along the edge of the creek, he whimpered for them as a child might grieve.

The forest grew more open after a time, and this cheered him up a little. Also the warmth of the sun was taking the ache out of his body. He grew hungrier and hungrier. He had depended entirely on Kazan and Gray Wolf for food. His parents had, in some ways, made a great baby of him. Gray Wolf's blindness accounted for this, for since his birth she had not taken up her hunting with Kazan, and it was quite natural that Baree should stick close to her, though more than once he had been filled with a great yearning to follow his father. Nature was hard at work trying to overcome its handicap now. It was struggling to impress on Baree that the time had now come when he must seek his own food. The fact impinged itself upon him slowly but steadily, and he began to think of the three or four shellfish he had caught and devoured on the stony creek-bar near the windfall. He also remembered the open clam shell he had found, and the lusciousness of the tender morsel inside it. A new excitement began to possess him. He became, all at once, a hunter.

With the thinning out of the forest the creek grew more shallow. It ran over bars of sand and stones, and Baree began to nose along the edge of these. For a long time he had no success. The few crayfish that he saw were exceedingly lively and elusive, and all the clam-shells were shut so tight that even Kazan's powerful jaws would have had difficulty in smashing them. It was almost noon when he caught his first crayfish, about as big as a man's forefinger. He devoured it ravenously. The taste of food gave him fresh courage. He caught two more crayfish during the afternoon. It was almost dusk when he stirred a young rabbit out from under a cover of grass. If he had been a month older, he could have caught it. He was still very hungry, for three crayfish—scattered through the day—had not done much to fill the emptiness that was growing steadily in him.

With the approach of night Baree's fears and great loneliness returned. Before the day had quite gone he found himself a shelter under a big rock, where there was a warm, soft bed of sand. Since his fight with Papayuchisew, he had traveled a long distance, and the rock under which he made his bed this night was at least eight or nine miles from the windfall. It was in the open of the creek bottom, with the dark forest of spruce and cedars close on either side; and when the moon rose, and the stars filled the sky, Baree could look out and see the water of the stream shimmering in a glow almost as bright as day. Directly in front of him, running to the water's edge, was a broad carpet of white sand. Across this sand, half an hour later, came a huge black bear.

Until Baree had seen the otters at play in the creek, his conceptions of the forests had not gone beyond his own kind, and such creatures as owls and rabbits and small feathered things. The otters had not frightened him, because he still measured things by size, and Nekik was not half as big as Kazan. But the bear was a monster beside which Kazan would have stood a mere pigmy. If nature was taking this way of introducing Baree to the fact that there were more important creatures in the forests than dogs and wolves and owls and crayfish, she was driving the point home with a little more than necessary emphasis. For Wakayoo, the bear, weighed six hundred pounds if he weighed an ounce. He was fat and sleek from a month's feasting on fish. His shiny coat was like black velvet in the moonlight, and he walked with a curious rolling motion with his head hung low. The horror grew when he stopped broadside in the carpet of sand not more than ten feet from the rock under which Baree was shivering as if he had the ague.

It was quite evident that Wakayoo had caught scent of him in the air. Baree could hear him sniff—could hear his breathing—caught the starlight flashing in his reddish-brown eyes as they swung suspiciously toward the big boulder. If Baree could have known then that he—his insignificant little self—was making that monster actually nervous and uneasy, he would have given a yelp of joy. For Wakayoo, in spite of his size, was somewhat of a coward when it came to wolves. And Baree carried the wolf-scent. It grew stronger in Wakayoo's nose; and just then, as if to increase whatever nervousness was growing in him, there came from out of the forest behind him a long wailing howl.

With an audible grunt, Wakayoo moved on. Wolves were pests, he argued. They wouldn't stand up and fight. They'd snap and yap at one's heels for hours at a time, and were always out of the way quicker than a wink when one turned on them. What was the use of hanging around where there were wolves, on a beautiful night like this? He lumbered on decisively. Baree could hear him splashing heavily through the water of the creek. Not until then did the wolf-dog draw a full breath. It was almost a gasp.

But the excitement was not over for the night. Baree had chosen his bed at a place where the animals came down to drink, and where they crossed from one of the creek forests to the other. Not long after the bear had disappeared he heard a heavy crunching in the sand, and hoofs rattling against stones, and a bull moose with a huge sweep of antlers passed through the open space in the moonlight. Baree stared with popping eyes, for if Wakayoo had weighed six hundred pounds, this gigantic creature whose legs were so long that it seemed to be walking on stilts weighed at least twice as much. A cow moose followed, and then a calf. The calf seemed all legs. It was too much for Baree, and he shoved himself farther and farther back under the rock until he lay wedged in like a sardine in a box. And there he lay until morning.

• • • • • • •

When Baree ventured forth from under his rock at the beginning of the next day, he was a much older puppy than when he met Papayuchisew, the young owl, in his path near the old windfall. If experience can be made to take the place of age, he had aged a great deal in the last forty-eight hours. In fact, he had passed almost out of puppyhood. He awoke with a new and much broader conception of the world. It was a big place. It was filled with many things, of which Kazan and Gray Wolf were not the most important. The monsters he had seen on the moonlit plot of sand had roused in him a new kind of caution, and the one greatest instinct of beasts—the primal understanding that it is the strong that prey upon the weak—was wakening swiftly in him. As yet he quite naturally measured brute force and the menace of things by size alone. Thus the bear was more terrible than Kazan, and the moose was more terrible than the bear.

Baree has now discovered that it's a big world with many adventures. And he's learning fast.

Writer's Tribute to Chivalry of Women

I am convinced that, in their relations to men, women are the chivalrous sex. In fact, I cannot understand how the reverse idea ever came to be accepted. It must have been a superpowerful Crusader who first enforced it with his mace.

How many times have I noticed how a woman, in the very climax of a quarrel, will not refrain from saying the one small, last thing of all that will cut nearest to the place where a man keeps his "wince." And I have heard men talk of "playing the game."

"Playing the game." "Letting down one's side." "It isn't done." Like this man, thousands of people give heed to constipation only when it is too late.

"I'll tell you why they wouldn't insure you—

"You allowed constipation to become chronic—until finally it resulted in organic disease.

"People don't realize how insidious constipation is. Its first effects are hardly more than annoyances—headaches, loss of appetite, sleeplessness and the like. But in time, as the body is subjected to continued intestinal poisoning, it may lead to high blood pressure, rheumatism, diabetes or even Bright's disease.

"Stop constipation if you wish to live long. Take a little Nujol every day—that will keep you regular."

Nujol relieves constipation in Nature's way

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. It does not affect the stomach and is not absorbed by the body. Medical authorities approve Nujol because it is safe, gentle and natural in its action.

Nujol makes up for a deficiency—temporary or chronic—in the supply of natural lubricant in the intestines. It softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination without overtaxing the intestinal muscles.

Nujol can be taken for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly in accordance with the directions on each bottle. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time. Ask your druggist for Nujol today and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Biwabik—Thrift soon will be part of the public school curriculum here with the installation of a savings system for pupils under supervision of the board of education.

Pequot—A 12 year old girl who burned the East Gull Lake schoolhouse near here because she did not like the teacher, is to be tried at the June term of District Court.

Sleepy Eye—The Izaak Walton League will buy a plot of ground near the Cottonwood river for picnic and camping grounds. Other outdoor improvements are planned.

Waseca—Squads of Minnesota rangers will be organized at once and equipped in Waseca, Janesville, New Richland, Waldorf, Otisco and Matawan as the result of a decision of the Waseca County Bankers Association.

Dodge Center—Nearly 300 Dodge county village and farm women began work in a poultry production project which promises to increase the value of the county's poultry and egg output considerably.

Minneapolis—This city's annual loss from the smoke nuisance is set at between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 by the smoke abatement committee of the Civic & Commerce association.

Minneapolis—Despite the heaviest snowfall of the year ceremonies of laying the cornerstone of the new $3,000,000 municipal auditorium, characterized by officials as "one of the most significant steps in the history of Minneapolis," were conducted Saturday.

Duluth—George W. Lorence, former cashier of the People's State bank of Duluth, who confessed to embezzling $83,500 of the bank's funds, pleaded guilty in district court, and was sentenced to serve not more than 10 years on two counts.

St. Paul—Otis E. Clymer, former major league baseball player and star outfielder for the Minneapolis baseball team from 1910 to 1912, was fatally injured in an automobile accident at St. Paul.

Winona—A further step to make this section of the state a "sportsman's paradise" has been taken with completion of arrangements for the reception of 460 pairs of Hungarian partridge to be liberated in Winona county about March 20.

Minneapolis—Three thousand farmers and dairymen of Minnesota came to Minneapolis and joined with state and city officials and business men in celebrating the formal opening of the new $350,000 plant of the Minnesota Co-operative Creameries association.

St. Paul—Profits from the 17 state institution farms in 1925 totaled $234,303 as a result of products raised on 5,600 acres of land as compared to profits made in 1924 of $156,173, John Coleman, member of the state board of control and in supervision of this activity, announced.

St. Paul—A complaint charging grand larceny in the first degree was issued against Walter C. Martin, deputy state treasurer. The complaint was signed by E. W. Stark, vice treasurer, and charged specifically the theft of $1,483.34 of state funds on June 30, 1925.

St. Paul—A tabulation completed by the state tax commission shows that railroads operating in Minnesota increased their gross earnings in 1925 more than $7,000,000 as compared to the previous year. The gross earnings of all roads in the state for the year totaled $160,561,807 as compared with $153,551,349 in 1924.

St. Paul—With 880 dangerous grade intersections in Minnesota already designated as "stop crossings" and "stop signals" installed by the railways at about 600 of them, the Minnesota railroad and warehouse commission will begin an inspection of crossings on the last major line to be surveyed—the Minneapolis & St. Louis.

St. Paul—Declaring that if Minnesota is to reap the benefits of the present tide of industrial decentralization, it must act at once, Colonel L. H. Brittin, author of the proposal for a state industrial promotion bureau, announced that he will offer his services to Governor Christianson to organize a volunteer bureau for the work.

Duluth—The supply of anthracite coal at the head of the lakes is entirely exhausted, but Duluth has little need to worry over the fuel situation for there is plenty of soft coal in storage, coal company officials said. At the end of the 1925 lakes shipping season only 150,000 tons of hard coal were in storage at the docks, the supply being much lower than in former years.

Minneapolis—The board of public welfare refused to reaffirm its decision to move the Minneapolis General hospital to a site on or adjacent to the University of Minnesota campus, to be purchased with funds from the general education board of the Rockefeller foundation. The university, nevertheless, intends to go ahead with its part of the medical development program projected under the Rockefeller foundation's offer.

Shakopee—To insure a uniform high grade of seed corn in Eagle Creek township, the Eagle Creek Farmers Club has established a township testing station. Experienced testers will have charge of the station and all farmers in the township have been invited to submit samples of their corn.

Minneapolis—There has been an increase in the amount of land under cultivation during the last five years, and farm land alone now is valued at $6,000,000, Bernard V. Moore, deputy governor of the Federal Reserve Bank, told the Minneapolis Business Men's Association.

REPORT CARDS

In the town of Reven-Saw the children and their parents changed places. The parents took the places of the children and the children took the places of the parents. They even grew to look like each other.

The parents had thought it would be fun to be children for a while with nothing to worry them, and the children had thought it would be fun to be parents and to do the disciplining and attending to everything.

The parents went to school and the children stayed home and did the work of parents. These new parents were called by their own names, with "parent" before each name, and the new children were called by their own last names with "Mother" or "Daddy" before it; so that Mrs. Fenwick, who had been the parent, was now little Mother Fenwick and her daughter Sally was called Parent Sally.

The teachers sent home the children's reports by the children themselves and it was a very solemn evening in almost every home in Reven-Saw when the parents looked at the report cards. None of the children did as well as their parents thought they should have done. Not one.

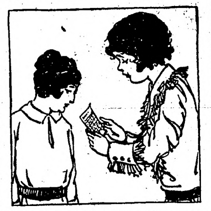
Little Mother Fenwick's report card was quite good as far as her lessons were concerned and little Mother Fenwick hoped her parents would be so pleased with that that they would not notice what her teacher had written down in the corner in ink:

"Little Mother Fenwick is an apt pupil and would be a pride to the school if it were not for her habit of talking too much. She is constantly interrupting and whispering and while it does not affect her own work in particular it is bad for the school and for the other pupils."

Parent Sally's face was very grave when she saw this, as she did, the very first thing!

"Mother Fenwick," she said, "I'm sorry to see what your teacher has written. I wouldn't blame you if you weren't good in all your lessons.

"Some lessons are hard to learn, and take time, but any child can be good. To think that a child of mine has to have the teacher write in ink on her report card additional words about her conduct."



Parent Sally's Face Was Very Grave.

"I did well in my lessons," Mother Fenwick protested.

"True, my child, and I would be pleased about that. Only this news of your conduct takes away my pleasure."

"What's this? What's this? You—a banker's son, and your arithmetic is just above the pass mark. Surely you could do better than that! This is anything but good news."

Altogether it was a dismal night and when the little Mothers and Daddies compared notes the next day it semed as though no one had had an exactly pleasant and jolly evening.

Some time after this came word that some of the relatives were coming to visit. The new parents were quite upset. The visiting relatives had stayed away for a long time because they had thought everything would be too upset for their nerves.

Now that they had not heard of anything particularly upsetting happening in Reven-Saw they had decided to satisfy their curiosity and see how all was turning out.

The parents, however, wrote and asked the relatives to wait until the school's examinations were over and the big pageant which would immediately follow. The relatives, somewhat hurt, agreed.

The parents could tell that from their letters and it made them feel a little uncomfortable and as though they should have let them come at once in spite of the confusion.

Still, it was better this way, even though some of the relatives found it hard to understand.

Ups and Downs

Mother—Did you call Mary up this morning?

Daughter—Yes, but she wasn't down.

Mother—But why didn't you call her down?

Daughter—Because she wasn't up.

Mother—Then call her up now and call her down for not being down when you called her up.

Let Tanlac restore your health

If your body is all fagged-out and run down, if you are losing weight steadily, lack appetite, have no strength or energy—why not let Tanlac help you back to health and strength?

So many millions have been benefited by the Tanlac treatment, so many thousands have written to testify to that effect that it's sheer folly not to make the test.

Tanlac, you know, is a great natural tonic and builder, a compound, after the famous Tanlac formula, of roots, barks and herbs. It purges the blood stream, revitalizes the digestive organs and enables the sickly body to regain its vanished weight.

You don't need to wait long to get results. Tanlac goes right to the seat of trouble. In a day or so you note a vast difference in your condition. You have more appetite, sleep better at night and the color begins to creep back into your washed-out cheeks.

Don't put off taking Tanlac another precious day. Step into the nearest drug store and get a bottle of this world-famed tonic. That's the first important step back to health and vigor. Every day's delay means unnecessary suffering, for Tanlac starts to clean out and tone up the system right away. And by acting promptly you will avoid further loss of energy and weight due to your present run down condition. Take Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation.

Gained Weight and Health From Tanlac

"For 2 years I suffered terribly. Food felt like lead in my stomach. Could not sleep, was tired in morning, drowsy all day. Since taking Tanlac I've gained 10 lbs., have no pain, eat and sleep regularly."

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which said default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgage hereinafter named is authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and it hereby does declare said sum due, which mortgage was executed by Gustaf Peterson and Nettie Peterson, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated September 13th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 18th day of September, A. D., 1920 at 8:30 o'clock A. M., in Book 92 of Mortgages, on page 298;

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment, dated July 30th, A. D., 1923 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota on the 17th day of February 1926 at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 443;

And whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage, on February 20th, 1926, paid delinquent taxes on the mortgaged property hereinafter described in the sum of Seventy-two and 24—100 Dollars ($72.24), and whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage has elected and hereby does elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Three Thousand Dollars ($3000.00), with accumulated interest from the 13th day of September 1923 at the rate of six per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise, to recover the debt, or any part thereof;

NOW, THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the following described premises, included in and covered by said mortgage, the balance of said premises described in said mortgage having heretofore been released from the lein of said mortgage, viz:

Northwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter (NW1-4—SW1-4), and Southwest Quarter of the Northwest Quarter (SW1-4 NW1-4), of Section Thirty-six (36), in Township One Hundred Fifty-six (156) North, of Range Forty-three (43) West of the Fifth P. M., in Marshall County and State of Minnesota,

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County at the Front door of the County Court House, in the city of Warren, in said County and State, on the 19th day of April 1926 at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest and the sum of $72.24 for taxes paid on said premises, with interest from date of payment, together with the costs and disburgements of such sale and Fifty Dollars attorney fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure. NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgagee hereinafter named is authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and payable and he hereby does declare the said sum due and payable, which mortgage was executed by Ole J. Moen, a single man, Mortgagor, to Deposit Bank of Winona, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated June 7th, 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota on the 11th day of June, A. D. 1920, at 8:30 o'clock A. M., in Book 92 of Mortgages, on page [illegible];

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Bank of Winona, Mortgagee, to J. M. Berthe, by written assignment, dated June 12th, A. D. 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 25th day of February, A. D. 1926, at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 445;

And whereas, the said J. M. Berthe, the assignee and holder of said mortgage, has duly elected and does hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained: and whereas there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage, at the date of this notice, the sum of Five Hundred Dollars ($500.00), with accumulated interest from the 7th day of June 1921 at the rate of six per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law, or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof:

NOW, THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz:

Northwest Quarter (NW¼) of the Southwest Quarter (SW¼), of Section Twelve (12), in Township One Hundred Fifty-six (156) North, of Range Forty-two (42) West of the 5th P. M., in Marshall County and State of Minnesota.

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the Front door of the County Court House in the City of Warren, in said County and State, on the 26th day of April 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Twenty-five Dollars attorneys fees, included in the amount stipulated as attorneys fees in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

Dated March 5th, 1926.

Patrons, Attention!

Don't forget to place your order for a Cooling Tank before the weather gets warm. It is communities that have patrons using cooling tanks that produce the best kind of cream during the warm weather.

Cream should be cooled in cold water immediately after separation, both summer and winter. It doesn't take long to cool same if you use a cream stirrer and a pail or two of real cold water. It is the animal heat you want to get out, and it should be gotten out quickly.

Minnesota Cow Makes A New World's Record

According to official figures received at University Farm from the American Guernsey Cattle Club, Maxim's May Queen of Dassel, owned by R. B. Shepard, St. Paul Park, Minn., has just broken the world's 365-day butterfat record for senior 2-year-old Guernseys. She produced 849.86 pounds fat and 13,957 pounds milk on official test, and thus topped the previous world's record by a margin of more than 23 pounds fat. She displaces the former world's champion senior 2-year-old, Brightness of Indian Bridge, owned by C. L. Whitney of Albany, N. Y. Brightness has a record of 826.03 pounds fat.

Grouse Season Closed

St. Paul, March 2.—Governor Theodore Christianson today issued an order closing the season on ruffed grouse and partridge on recommendation of James F. Gould, state game and fish commissioner.

The season is closed as of March 1, to the close of the session of the legislature of 1927 unless otherwise ordered. This action was taken because of threatened undue depletion of this game bird.

State Declares War On Alfalfa Weevil

The Minnesota State Department of Agriculture has established a quarantine on account of the insect known as the alfalfa weevil against districts said to be infested, namely, the state of Utah and parts of Idaho, Colorado, Nevada, Wyoming, Oregon and California. The importation of alfalfa hay or cereal straw of any kind grown or stored in the infected districts, or of alfalfa meal, is prohibited by order of quarantine issued by the state entomologist, A. G. Ruggles of University Farm.

The Impeiishable Argument

One argument that the prohibition law is a failure is because the law is ignored by the moonshiners, rum-runners, blind-piggers, and boot-leggers. Using the same line of argument, the laws against arson, robbery, and murder are also failures because they don't stop those crimes. It would be just as sensible to abolish the law against murder as to abolish the law against liquor crimes because they continue in spite of the law.—Hibbing Daily News.

"Something raw is essential to our diet," is the statement in a well-meaning state bulletin. Perhaps this is why some people seem to thrive on gossip.

A Colorado newspaper recently took thru the courts a suit against a subscriber who owed eleven years' subscription and refused to pay, claiming he had ordered it for only one year. The court decided the subscriber must pay, holding that he had accepted the paper during all that time and therefore owed for it.

Many people have the impression that a newspaper cannot collect delinquent subscriptions, but it can. It has been thru the supreme courts of practically every state in the union, and the newspaper has invariably won.

NEPANAO

Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more.

It was quite fortunate, for Baree that this instinct did not go to the limit in the beginning and make him understand that his own breed—the wolf—was most feared of all the creatures, claw, hoof, and wing, of the forests. Otherwise, like the small boy who thinks he can swim before he has mastered a stroke, he might somewhere have jumped in beyond his depth and had his head chewed off.

Very much alert, with the hair standing up along his spine, and a little growl in his throat, Baree smelled of the big footprints made by the bear and the moose. It was the bear-scent that made him growl. He followed the tracks to the edge of the creek. After that he resumed his wandering, and also his hunt for food.

For two hours he did not find a crayfish. Then he came out of the green timber into the edge of a burned-over country. Here everything was black. The stumps of the trees stood up like huge charred canes. It was a comparatively fresh "burn" of last autumn, and the ash was still soft under Baree's feet. Straight through this black region ran the creek, and over it hung a blue sky in which the sun was shining. It was quite inviting to Baree. The fox, the wolf, the moose, and the caribou would have turned back from the edge of this dead country. In another year it would be good hunting-ground, but now it was lifeless. Even the owls would have found nothing to eat out there.

It was the blue sky and the sun and the softness of the earth under his feet that lured Baree. It was pleasant to travel in after his painful experiences in the forest. He continued to follow the stream, though there was now little possibility of his finding anything to eat. The water had become sluggish and dark; the channel was choked with charred debris that had fallen into it when the forest had burned, and its shores were soft and muddy. After a time, when Baree stopped and looked about him, he could no longer see the green timber he had left. He was alone in that desolate wilderness of charred tree-corpses. It was as still as death, too. Not the chirp of a bird broke the silence. In the soft ash he could not hear the fall of his own feet. But he was not frightened. There was the assurance of safety here.

If he could only find something to eat! That was the master thought that possessed Baree. Instinct had not yet impressed upon him that this which he saw all about him was starvation. He went on, seeking hopefully for food. But at last, as the hours passed, hope began to die out of him. The sun sank westward. The sky grew less blue; a low wind began to ride over the tops of the stubs, and now and then one of them fell with a startling crash.

Baree could go no farther. An hour before dusk he lay down in the open, weak and starved. The sun disappeared behind the forest. The moon rolled up from the east. The sky glittered with stars—and all through the night Baree lay as if dead. When morning came, he dragged himself to the stream for a drink. With his last strength he went on. It was the wolf urging him—compelling him to struggle to the last for his life. The dog in him wanted to lie down and die. But the wolf-spark in him burned stronger. In the end it won. Half a mile farther on he came again to the green timber.

In the forests as well as in the great cities fate plays its changing and whimsical hand. If Baree had dragged himself into the timber half an hour later he would have died. He was too far gone now to hunt for crayfish or kill the weakest bird. But he came just as Sekoosew, the ermine—the most bloodthirsty little pirate of all the wild—was making a kill.

That was fully a hundred yards from where Baree lay stretched out under a spruce, almost ready to give up the ghost. Sekoosew was a mighty hunter of his kind. His body was about seven inches long, with a tiny black-tipped tail appended to it, and he weighed perhaps five ounces. A baby's fingers could have encircled him anywhere between his four legs, and his little sharp-pointed head with its beady red eyes could slip easily through a hole an inch in diameter. For several centuries Sekoosew had helped to make history. It was he—when his pelt was worth a hundred dollars in king's gold—that lured the first shipload of gentlemen adventurers over the sea, with Prince Rupert at their head; it was little Sekoosew who was responsible for the forming of the great Hudson's Bay company and the discovery of half a continent; for almost three centuries he had fought his fight for existence with the trapper. And now, though he was no longer worth his weight in yellow gold, he was the cleverest, the fiercest, and the most merciless of all the creatures that made up his world.

As Baree lay under the tree, Sekoosew was creeping on his prey. His game was a big fat spruce-hen standing under a thicket of black currant bushes. He was like a shadow—a gray dot here, a flash there, now hidden behind a stick no larger than a man's wrist, appearing for a moment, the next instant gone as quickly as if he had not existed. Thus he approached from fifty feet to within three feet of the spruce-hen. That was his favorite striking distance. Unerringly he launched himself at the drowsy partridge's throat, and his needle-like teeth sank through feathers into flesh.

Sekoosew was prepared for what happened then. It always happened when he attacked Napanao, the wood-partridge. Her wings were powerful, and her first instinct when he struck was always that of flight. She rose straight up now with a great thunder of wings. Sekoosew hung tight, his teeth buried deep in her throat, and his tiny, sharp claws clinging to her like hands. Through the air he whizzed with her, biting deeper and deeper, until a hundred yards from where that terrible death-thing had fastened to her throat, Napanao crashed again to earth.

Sekoosew Was Creeping on His Prey.

Where she fell was not ten feet from Baree. For a few moments he looked at the struggling mass of feathers in a daze, not quite comprehending that at last food was almost within his reach. Napanao was dying, but she still struggled convulsively with her wings. Baree rose stealthily, and after a moment in which he gathered all his remaining strength, he made a rush for her. His teeth sank into her breast—and not until then did he see Sekoosew. The ermine had raised his head from the death-grip at the partridge's throat, and his savage little red eyes glared for a single instant into Baree's. Here was something too big to kill, and with an angry squeak the ermine was gone. Napanao's wings relaxed, and the throb went out of her body. She was dead. Baree hung on until he was sure. Then he began his feast.

With murder in his heart, Sekoosew hovered near, whisking here and there but never coming nearer than half a dozen feet from Baree. His eyes were redder than ever. Now and then he emitted a sharp little squeak of rage. Never had he been so angry in all his life! To have a fat partridge stolen from him like this was an imposition he had never suffered before. He wanted to dart in and fasten his teeth in Baree's jugular. But he was too good a general to make the attempt, too good a Napoleon to jump deliberately to his Waterloo. An owl he would have fought. He might even have given battle to his big brother—and his deadliest enemy—the mink. But in Baree he recognized the wolf-breed, and he vented his spite at a distance. After a time his good sense returned, and he went off on another hunt.

Baree ate a third of the partridge, and the remaining two thirds he cached very carefully at the foot of the big spruce. Then he hurried down to the creek for a drink. The world looked very different to him now. After all, one's capacity for happiness depends largely on how deeply one has suffered. One's hard luck and misfortune form the measuring-stick for future good luck and fortune. So it was with Baree. Forty-eight hours ago a full stomach would not have made him a tenth part as happy as he was now. Then his greatest longing was for his mother. Since then a still greater yearning had come into his life—for food. In a way it was fortunate for him that he had almost died of exhaustion and starvation, for his experience had helped to make a man of him—or a wolf-dog, just as you are of a mind to put it. He would miss his mother for a long time. But he would never miss her again as he had missed her yesterday, and the day before.

For another day and night Baree remained in the vicinity of his cache. When the last bone was picked, he moved on. He now entered a country where subsistence was no longer a perilous problem for him. It was a lynx country, and where there are lynx, there are also a great many rabbits. When the rabbits thin out, the lynx emigrate to better hunting grounds. As the snowshoe rabbit breeds all the summer through, Baree found himself in a land of plenty. It was not difficult for him to catch and kill the young rabbits. For a week he prospered and grew bigger and stronger each day. But all the time, stirred by that seeking, Wanderlust spirit—still hoping to find the old home and his mother—he traveled into the north and east.

And this was straight into the trapping country of Pierrot, the halfbreed.

Pierrot, until two years ago, had believed himself to be one of the most fortunate men in the big wilderness. That was before La Mort Rouge—the Red Death—came. He was half French, and he had married a Cree chief's daughter, and in their log cabin on the Gray Loon they had lived for many years in great prosperity and happiness. Pierrot was proud of three things in this wild world of his: he was immensely proud of Wyola, his royal-blooded wife; he was proud of his daughter; and he was proud of his reputation as a hunter. Until the Red Death came, life was quite complete for him. It was then—two years ago—that the smallpox killed his princess wife. He still lived in the little cabin on the Gray Loon, but he was a different Pierrot. The heart was sick in him. It would have died, had it not been for Nepeese, his daughter. His wife had named her Nepeese, which means the Willow. Nepeese had grown up like the willow, slender as a reed, with all her mother's wild beauty, and with a little of the French thrown in. She was sixteen, with great, dark, wonderful eyes, and hair so beautiful that an agent from Montreal passing that way had once tried to buy it. It fell in two shining braids, each as big as a man's wrist, almost to her knees. "Non, M'sieu," Pierrot had said, a cold glitter in his eyes as he saw what was in the agent's face. "It is not for barter."

Two days after Baree had entered his trapping ground, Pierrot came in from the forests with a troubled look in his face.

And now he is in the trapping-grounds of Pierrot and the lovely Nepeese. How will he fare?

Early Peoples Passed Up Delicious Clams

Dr. Edward S. Morse of Salem, who spent 45 years sorting over the shell heaps that are found along the New England shore, found them composed largely of oysters and clams. But when he went to Europe to consult with Professor Steenstrup, the Danish expert on European shell heaps, he was amazed to learn that no clam shells were found among the oysters, says Edwin E. Slosson, director of science service, writing in Collier's Magazine.

Although clams abounded in the Baltic, the prehistoric people never ate them. It was the same in England; the clam had never been eaten, even in ancient times. We learned the epicurean delights of the clam from the North American Indians, to whom we are indebted for tobacco.

Now we are accustomed to think of these early ancestors of ours as rather undiscriminating in their diet, having no prejudices against beast, bird, fish, mollusk or insect. Yet these poor benighted creatures had lived for 25,000 years with clams served up to them on the shell as a free lunch at every tide, and they wouldn't touch 'em.

MOTHER OF SEVEN CHILDREN

Helped in Caring for them by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Glasgow, Ky.—"I am the mother of seven children, the eldest being only 12 years, and I feel that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped to pull me through the roughest places of my married life. At one time I was so downhearted that life was a misery. A friend in Indianapolis, Indiana, told me of the Vegetable Compound, and after taking a few bottles of it I became myself again and it was a pleasure to do my housework and gardening. Since then I always use your medicine when I feel weak from overwork and it straightens me out."—MRS. MELISSA BARDERS, Route 2, care of O. F. Steenbergen, Glasgow, Ky.

St. Paul—Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg was elected honorary president of the Minnesota State society in Washington.

Olivia—O. T. Sunde, 47 years old, formerly sheriff of Renville county and federal prohibition agent, died at a Rochester hospital.

Chatfield—D. E. Farrell, 79 years old, territorial pioneer, and for a long time known as the "cattle king of southern Minnesota," died here from a heart attack.

Ironton—A trainload of 20 cars of ore from the Armour No. 2 mine has been freighted to Superior to be held for spring shipment. This is the first ore to be shipped this year.

Minneapolis—Iowa's fighting basketball team entered a quadruple tie for the Big Ten floor championship at the Kenwood Armory by defeating Minnesota in the final game of the conference floor race, 17 to 15.

St. Paul—Snow has blocked 906 miles of trunk highway in the state, the highway department reported in its weekly condition report. The department has had 2,500 men, 50 snow plows and 1,000 teams at work opening the roads.

St. Paul—Competitive bids on the construction and the improvement of nearly $1,000,000 of added trunk highway throughout the state of Minnesota for 1926, were opened by Charles M. Babcock, state highway commissioner.

Minneapolis — Creamery memberships in the Land o'Lakes Creameries, Inc., will pass the 500 mark in 1926, making it the largest co-operative butter marketing enterprise in the country, officers said at the closing session of the fifth annual convention.

Anoka—A deputy sheriff of Anoka county left for Shreveport, La., with requisition papers for the extradition of three men who were indicted, charged with holding up the Anoka National bank December 8, when $15,000 was stolen.

St. Paul—Four bandits, arrested recently in Menomonie, Wis., on suspicion that they were slayers of the two St. Paul policemen, were sentenced to the state penitentiary at Stillwater on highway robbery charges.

St. Paul—Laurence C. "Larry-Ho" Hodgson lead the field of three candidates in the St. Paul primary election for mayor. His opponent on the ticket at the final election May 5 will be the Rev. Howard Y. Williams, pastor of the Peoples church, the Progressive-Labor candidate.

Minneapolis—Minnesota has approximately 200 women in public office—including mayors, sheriffs, constables, justices of the peace, game wardens and even an excellent "smoke scout" in the forest fire service—a survey made under the auspices of the Minnesota League of Women Voters has revealed.

St. Paul—Purchasers of stock in the U. S. I. Realty company, by contract, are not obliged to fulfill the contract of purchase, the state supreme court held in affirming the actions of Mille Lacs, Olmsted, Stearns, and Polk county district courts. The decision does not affect actual stockholders. The action of the high court is far reaching and involves payment of from $300,000 to $600,000 by 600 persons.

St. Paul—Five Minnesota men were named by Governor Theodore Christianson to represent the state as delegates to the national conference on street and highway safety, at Washington, D. C., March 23, 24, 25. They were Judge Levi M. Hall, Minneapolis; George H. Herrold, head of the St. Paul city planning commission; Charles M. Babcock, state highway commissioner, and Bert Wheeler, commissioner of safety, Duluth.

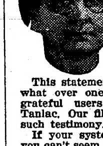
St. Paul—With 30,000,000 more bushels of grain on Minnesota farms than was there a year ago, farmers of the state are making plans for greater livestock raising, reports show. Paul H. Kirk, state agricultural statistician, estimated in his March crop report that there are 153,444,000 bushels of grain on Minnesota farms, an increase of 30,241,000 bushels over March 1, last year.

St. Paul—Although the total number of fatal automobile accidents in the United States increased from 17,827 in 1924 to 19,828 in 1925, Minnesota had fewer fatal accidents last year than in the year previous, according to figures made public by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce. The total for Minnesota last year was 345, as compared with 361 the year before. Minnesota, New York and Oregon are the only states that show a reduction.

St. Paul—The house passed a bill granting consent of congress to the highway department of Minnesota to reconstruct a bridge across the Mississippi river between the city of Anoka, and Champlin. A measure giving federal authority to the board of county commissioners of Aitkin county, Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river also was passed.

St. Paul—Oscar Arneson, 47 years old, chief clerk of the Minnesota house of representatives, for 15 years, fell dead a short distance from his home.

New health in Tanlac



"I suffered agony for eight years, due to gas on stomach. Eating caused knife-like pains to shoot through me. Tanlac was a Godsend for today I eat well, sleep sound and wake up refreshed." Mrs. John Golla, 1121 Gardner St., Wisconsin Rapids, Wis.

This statement merely backs up what over one hundred thousand grateful users have said about Tanlac. Our files are packed with such testimony.

If your system is run down, if you can't seem to eat or sleep, have lost weight or suffer from trying pain, why not let Tanlac start you back to vigorous strength and health.

No long, wretched wait to get results! Tanlac starts right in to build you up. It cleans the blood, revitalizes digestive organs, fixes up the liver and makes you feel like a new person. For constipation take Tanlac Vegetable Pills.

CHOCOLATE

Chocolate and cocoa are almost universally well liked. They may be served in various ways.

Adding a tablespoonful or two of cocoa to a cake or pudding will give a different flavor. One-fourth cupful of cocoa added to an angel food recipe will make a most tasty chocolate cake.

Cocoa Tutti-Frutti Cream.—Use the following recipe for cocoa cream, adding one cupful of macaroons which have been dried and pounded, one cupful of candied cherries, cut into small pieces, one-half dozen marshmallows cut into bits, one-half dozen raisins, one tablespoonful of citron and the same of orange peel chopped fine; add the last just before putting into molds.

Cocoa Cream.—Mix one-half cupful of cocoa with one-half cupful of sugar and the yolks of two eggs, beaten; add two cupfuls of cream and one-fourth inch of cinnamon; cook in a double boiler until thick. Add two tablespoonfuls of gelatin softened in one-fourth cupful of cold water, and stir until dissolved over hot water. Add one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of vanilla and one cupful of heavy cream, beaten thick. Cool the first mixture before adding the cream. Mold and chill; serve with cream.

Chestnuts With Chocolate Cream.—Boil one quart of large chestnuts, remove the shells and press through a ricer; add four tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt, four tablespoonfuls of cream and three tablespoonfuls of maraschino sirup. Whip one cupful of heavy cream, add two tablespoonfuls of maraschino sirup, three of powdered sugar and four of melted chocolate. Fill molds with the blended mixture; chill and serve with a garnish of chopped nuts.

Good Things to Eat.

Salads are always acceptable and those a little out of the ordinary will never lack a welcome.

Italian Salad.—Cut one carrot and one turnip into slices and cook in boiling broth until tender. When cold add two cold boiled potatoes and one cooked beet cut into strips. Mix all together with a tablespoonful of scraped onion and pour over the following sauce:

Lombardy Sauce.—Cook one-fourth of a cupful of flour in one-fourth of a cupful of melted butter, add one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika and one cupful of jellied chicken broth; stir until boiling hot. Set over boiling water and beat in one-fourth of a cupful of butter, beaten with two egg yolks and the juice of half a lemon. As soon as the egg is cooked beat in three-fourths of a cupful of thick tomato sauce. When cold and ready to use, add one teaspoonful of parsley chopped very fine.

Fried Onions and Apples.—Slice two onions very thin and cook in a tablespoonful of hot fat until yellow, then add half a dozen sliced tart apples; cook until soft, adding a bit of water and fat if needed. Just before serving add a teaspoonful of sugar. Serve with roast pork, sausages or chops. If the onions are not liked, slice the apples after coring without peeling and fry in a little hot fat, turning until well browned. Sprinkle a little sugar over them—that helps to make a nice brown. Serve in overlapping slices around the platter of meat.

Dinner Salad.—Remove the sections from grapefruit and take off the connection tissue. Arrange on crisp lettuce, sprinkle with finely shredded green peppers and serve with mayonnaise dressing, or a good, well-seasoned French dressing.

A delicious cake filling is prepared with a cupful of maple sirup stirred thick with powdered sugar and used between the layers—for the top add a few chopped nuts.

Fresh Fish Salad.—Flake baked or boiled fish while hot. For a pint of fish cut six olives very thin lengthwise; to them add a tablespoonful of capers, a teaspoonful of the pulp of an onion, half a teaspoonful of salt, a tablespoonful of lemon juice, and two tablespoonfuls of olive oil. Mix and pour over the fish; mix with a fork to avoid crushing; let stand in a cool place until ready to serve. Serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise, passed in a bowl. Garnish with pickled beets.

Raisin Fruit Cake.—Pour one cupful of boiling water over one pound of raisins, let stand for twenty minutes and then drain. To one cupful of sugar add one-fourth cupful of butter, one egg, one teaspoonful each of soda, nutmeg and baking powder. Add one-half cupful of sour milk and flour to make a batter, adding the raisins last. Bake in a loaf in a slow oven.

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which said default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgage hereinafter named is authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and it hereby does declare said sum due, which mortgage was executed by Gustaf Peterson and Nettie Peterson, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated September 13th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 18th day of September, A. D., 1920 at 8:30 o'clock A. M., in Book 92 of Mortgages, on page 298;

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust & Savings Bank, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment, dated July 30th, A. D., 1923 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota on the 17th day of February 1926 at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 446;

And whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage, on February 20th, 1926 paid delinquent taxes on the mortgaged property hereinafter described in the sum of Seventy-two and 24—100 Dollars ($72.24), and whereas, the said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the assignee and holder of said mortgage has elected and hereby does elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Three Thousand Dollars ($3000.00), with accumulated interest from the 13th day of September 1923 at the rate of six per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise, to recover the debt, or any part thereof;

NOW, THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the following described premises, included in and covered by said mortgage, the balance of said premises described in said mortgage having heretofore been released from the lein of said mortgage, viz:

Northwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter (NW1-4—SW1-4), and Southwest Quarter of the Northwest Quarter (SW1-4 NW1-4), of Section Thirty-six (36), in Township One Hundred Fifty-six (156) North, of Range Forty-three (43) West of the Fifth P. M., in Marshall County and State of Minnesota.

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County at the Front door of the County Court House, in the city of Warren, in said County and State, on the 19th day of April 1926 at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest and the sum of $72.24 for taxes paid on said premises, with interest from date of payment, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Fifty Dollars attorney fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure. Halma Creamery Man Wins in Butter Contest

Halma, Minn., Mar. 27.—At a butter making contest conducted at a convention of co-operative creamery men at Minneapolis, one thousand delegates being in attendance, Oscar Stamnes of the Halma creamery won first place in the Northwest district of the state with a score of 94.93. Thirty five creameries were entered in this contest.

Mrs. Frank Carlson and son Oscar, who have been running the farm for C. H. Gunheim the past year, moved onto the Silbaugh place in Mud lake last week.

All copy for correspondence and advertising should reach this office not later than Tuesday noon of the week intended for insertion, to insure publication.

Rev. M. B. Ordahl is taking part in the Union Good Friday service given in the Thief River Falls auditorium today. Ten other ministers from this part of the state are also participating.

Three out of every eight patrons delivering cream for March delivered 100 lbs. or more. This is quite a gain over last year, which fact proves that a much bigger per centage of the cream is being produced during the winter than it used to be. Warm weather will soon be here. As a warning to you all, don't forget to have your cooling tanks ready in time to keep your cream sweet. It is quite different to keep cream cool during the winter than summer. Any cream that shows a sourness of 25—100 or more cannot be used in making a Land O' Lakes butter.

It is very important to deliver cream in the early forenoon during the hot weather. Your cream might be O. K. as far as acidity when you leave home but before you get it weighed chances are it is on a turning point. All cream should be weighed-in by 12 o'clock noon during the hot weather. If we keep weighing cream from 7 a. m. to 2:30 p. m. you can readily see what will happen to the cream before we get ready to pasteurize it, during the hot summer months. Chances are when we came to test same for sourness that the whole churning wouldn't go L. O'. L. grade. What would happen if we continued to pay you for L. O'. L. grade and get paid for a grade lower? I hope you realize what this means and that you will co-operate with us like you have been doing.

So far you have done your duty insofar as helping improve the quality of your cream, skimming a heavier test, and keeping your cream from freezing. If you will do as well when the weather gets warm and if you deliver your cream earlier than during the winter months I don't think we will have to worry about our large Land O' Lakes sign ever being taken away from us.

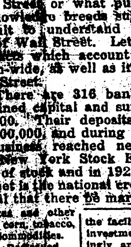
Suspicions About Wall Street and How They Arise

By FRANCIS H. SISSON, President
Trust Company Division, American Bankers Association



F. H. Sisson.

WOULD-BE economists, political orators and the general public make frequent positive assertions about the functions of Wall Street without any realization of what constitutes Wall Street or what purpose it serves. Lack of knowledge breeds suspicion. Yet it is not difficult to understand the nature and function of Wall Street. Let us set down a few of the facts which account for the existence and nation-wide, as well as international, services of Wall Street.

There are 316 banks in New York with combined capital and surplus of about $1,400,600,000. Their deposits aggregate over $11,500,000,000, and during 1924 their total volume of business reached nearly $250,000,000,000. The New York Stock Exchange in 1925 sold 463,000,000 shares of stock and in 1924 $3,828,000,000 worth of bonds. Wall Street is the national credit and money market. It is just as essential that there be markets for money and for stocks, bonds, mortgages and other securities as for cotton, corn, tobacco, wheat, hogs and other commodities.

If Wall Street Were Destroyed

Wall Street is the natural evolution of the forces of trade and finance. It exists because there is imperative need for it in the nation's business. If some cataclysm should destroy the financial district of New York we would see frantic efforts to re-establish it so that trade and industry could continue. If the production and marketing of agricultural and industrial commodities did not need such a financial institution, Wall Street would not exist.

We depend upon the farmer to help maintain the general level of prosperity. Wall Street as a money market is called upon to finance the growth and marketing of farm crops. Many Wall Street bankers were born and raised on farms. If they were not thoroughly familiar with agricultural requirements, they could not hold their present positions in the financial world.

In the period of deflation, Wall Street suffered proportionately as much as the farmer. The aggregate losses of Wall Street banks mounted to a staggering sum. Wall Street is not an independent institution, but an organic part of the country's business system, necessarily reflecting the ups and downs of business.

Four Billion Dollars

An approximate estimate of the main items in Wall Street's financial operations in handling farm crops shows that New York banks for the purpose of agriculture put out commercial loans to the value of one billion dollars, hold bankers' acceptances for another billion, buy commercial paper such as cattle and sheep loans for a third billion and carry balances of country banks for a fourth billion. Thus Wall Street furnishes a $4,000,000,000 river of credit annually to produce farm products and float them to market.

The outward flow to rural banks enables them to make the required advances on farm crops and for warehousing and handling cotton, tobacco, wheat, raisins, prunes and countless other products. Outside of his own personal efforts on his farm, Wall Street is the biggest single factor in the prosperity of the farmer. After these commodities have been moved to market, the money used in handling them returns to Wall Street for investment. New York is the largest security market in the country and offers a use and market for the idle capital of the rural banks between crops.

Funds from every part of the country flow to New York, attracted by the greater opportunity for their profitable use found in this center. Thus the accumulations of deposits are large, and in turn the openings for the useful employment of these funds in the facilitation of trade, industry and investment are upon a correspondingly ample scale. It is clear that these funds must be employed sanely, constructively and to the real service of the business community. Otherwise they would inevitably soon be withdrawn.

Huge Investments Help Farmers

These huge investment operations in Wall Street are of significance to the farmer. Much of the $10,000,000,000 invested in farm mortgages was advanced by Eastern financial institutions. In no sense is Wall Street's interest in agriculture local or sectional. The main function of New York financial institutions is to send money where it is most needed.

Another service rendered to agriculture by Wall Street is the purchase of Farm Loan bonds, Joint Stock Land Bank bonds and the debentures of the Intermediate Credit Banks. There is a total of $1,451,800,000 of this paper outstanding, of which New York banks took about one billion.

Wall Street loans to country banks are made at low rates, usually below 4½ per cent. The local banker's rates to his customers are adjusted to local conditions, which cannot justly be laid at the door of Wall Street.

General financial service to other industries related to agriculture also helps the farmer substantially. Wall Street loans to the packers, railroads, millers and farm-machinery manufacturers to help them serve agriculture.

Wall Street is as necessary and serviceable in the handling of credit and capital as is the cold-storage plant in caring for seasonal perishable products. The necessity of such a credit center in a country with a $60,000,000,000 annual business is obvious.

What the People Want

Every great international bank in New York maintains close relations with thousands of other banks in the United States and in every foreign country of any importance. The movements of commerce and investment are supported upon this interrelated system of domestic and foreign banks. Thus it comes about that the products of the farm, factory and mine are financed by these banks all the way from the producer to the foreign consumer.

Wall Street in the discharge of its true functions as the nation's reservoir of capital and credit includes the whole business community in its field of operations. Its control lies with the people. Their demands govern it, and their presence or absence from the market determines its trends. Wall Street prospers as farming and industry prosper. Its service is to the people of the whole country and, for them, to the people of other countries. It is the direct reflection of American agriculture, industry and commerce.—From the Country Gentleman.

BANKERS HELP

The Minnesota Bankers Association at its annual convention adopted the following resolution:

"We believe it to be the duty of every banker in the state of Minnesota to co-operate with our Agricultural Committee and to call the attention of its farmer patrons to the excellent work being done by our Agricultural College, and the means thereby available for the improvement of farming conditions and for the practical education of the boys and girls from our farms."

"A DOG!"

Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more. He strays into the trapping grounds of Pierrot and Nepeese.

"Something is killing off the young beavers," he explained to Nepeese, speaking to her in French. "It is a lynx or a wolf. Tomorrow—" He shrugged his thin shoulders, and smiled at her.

"We will go on the hunt," laughed Nepeese happily, in her soft Cree.

When Pierrot smiled at her like that, and began with "tomorrow," it always meant that she might go with him on the adventure he was contemplating.

* * * * * * * * *

Still another day later, at the end of the afternoon, Baree crossed the Gray Loon on a bridge of driftwood that had wedged between two trees. Just beyond the driftwood bridge there was a small open, and on the edge of this Baree paused to enjoy the last of the setting sun. As he stood motionless and listening, his tail drooping low, his ears alert, his sharp-pointed nose sniffing the new country to the north, there was not a pair of eyes in the forest that would not have taken him for a young wolf.

From behind a clump of young balsams, a hundred yards away, Pierrot and Nepeese had watched him come over the driftwood bridge. Now was the time, and Pierrot leveled his rifle. It was not until then that Nepeese touched his arm softly. Her breath came a little excitedly as she whispered:

"Nootawe, let me shoot. I can kill him!"

With a low chuckle Pierrot gave the gun to her. He counted the whelp as already dead. For Nepeese, at that distance, could send a bullet into an inch square nine times out of ten. And Nepeese, aiming carefully at Baree, pressed steadily with her brown forefinger upon the trigger.

As the Willow pulled the trigger of her rifle, Baree sprang into the air. He felt the force of the bullet before he heard the report of the gun. It lifted him off his feet, and then sent him rolling over and over as if he had been struck a hideous blow with a club. For a flash he did not feel pain. Then it ran through him like a knife of fire, and with that pain the dog in him rose above the wolf, and he let out a wild outcry of puppyish yapping as he rolled and twisted on the ground.

Pierrot and Nepeese had stepped from behind the balsams, the Willow's beautiful eyes shining with pride at the accuracy of her shot. Instantly she caught her breath. Her brown fingers clutched at the barrel of her rifle. The chuckle of satisfaction died on Pierrot's lips as Baree's cries of pain filled the forest.

"Uchi Moosis!" gasped Nepeese, in her Cree.

Pierrot caught the rifle from her.

"Diable! A dog—a puppy!" he cried.

He started on a run for Baree. But in their amazement they had lost a few seconds and Baree's dazed senses were returning. He saw them clearly as they came across the open—a new kind of monster of the forests! With a final wail he darted back into the deep shadows of the trees. He had shivered at sight of the bear and the moose, but for the first time he now sensed the real meaning of danger. And it was close after him. He could hear the crashing of the two-legged beasts in pursuit; strange cries were almost at his heels—and then suddenly he plunged without warning into a hole.

It was a shock to have the earth go out from under his feet like that, but Baree did not yelp. The wolf was dominant in him again. It urged him to remain where he was, making no move, no sound—scarcely breathing. The voices were over him; the strange feet almost stumbled in the hole where he lay. Looking out of his dark hiding place, he could see one of his enemies. It was Nepeese, the Willow. She was standing so that a last glow of the day fell upon her face. Baree did not take his eyes from her. Above his pain there rose in him a strange and thrilling fascination. The girl in a voice that was soft and plaintive and amazingly comforting to his terrified little heart, cried:

"Uchimoo—Uchimoo—Uchimoo!"

And then he heard another voice; and this voice, too, was far less terrible than many sounds he had listened to in the forests.

"We cannot find him, Nepeese," the voice was saying. "He has crawled off to die. It is too bad. Come."

Where Baree had stood in the edge of the open Pierrot paused and pointed to a birch sapling that had been cut clean off by the Willow's bullet. Nepeese understood. The sapling, no larger than her thumb, had turned her shot a trifle and had saved Baree from instant death.

She turned again, and called:

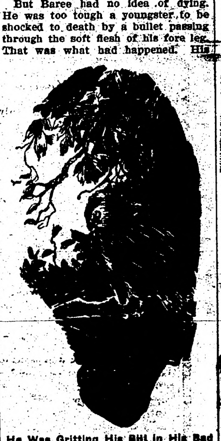
"Uchimoo—Uchimoo—Uchimoo!"

Her eyes were no longer filled with the thrill of slaughter.

"He will die—"

"Ayetun—yes, he will die."

But Baree had no idea of dying. He was too tough a youngster to be shocked to death by a bullet passing through the soft flesh of his fore leg. That was what had happened. His leg was torn to the bone, but the bone itself was untouched. He waited until the moon had risen before he crawled out of his hole.



He Was Gritting His Bill in His Bad Temper When He Heard Baree Approaching.

His leg had grown stiff then; it had stopped bleeding, but his whole body was racked by a terrible pain. Instinctively he felt that by traveling away from the hole he would get away from danger. This was the best thing that could have happened to him, for a little later a porcupine came wandering along, chattering to itself in its foolish, good-humored way, and fell with a fat thud into the hole. Had Baree remained, he would have been so full of quills that he must surely have died.

The exercise of travel was good for Baree. It gave his wound no opportunity to "set," as Pierrot would have said, for in reality his hurt was more painful than serious. For the first hundred yards he hobbled along on three legs, and after that he found that he could use his fourth by humoring it a great deal. He followed the creek for a half mile. Whenever a bit of brush touched his wound, he would snap at it viciously, and instead of whimpering when he felt one of the sharp twinges shooting through him, an angry little growl gathered in his throat, and his teeth clicked. Now that he was out of the hole, the effect of the Willow's shot was stirring every drop of wolf-blood in his body. In him there was a growing animosity—a feeling of rage not against any one thing in particular, but against all things. It was not the feeling with which he had fought Papayuchisew, the young owl. On this night the dog in him had disappeared. An accumulation of misfortunes had descended upon him, and out of these misfortunes—and his present hurt—the wolf had risen savage and vengeful.

This was the first night Baree had traveled. He was, for the time, unafraid of anything that might creep up on him out of the darkness. The blackest shadows had lost their thrill. It was the first big fight between the two natures that were born in him—the wolf and the dog—and the dog was vanquished. Now and then he stopped to lick his wound, and as he licked it he growled, as though for the hurt itself he held a personal antagonism. If Pierrot could have seen and heard, he would have understood very quickly, and he would have said: "Let him die. The club will never take that devil out of him."

In this humor Baree came, an hour later, out of the heavy timber of the creek bottom into the more open spaces of a small plain that ran along the foot of a ridge. It was in this plain that Oohoomisew hunted. Oohoomisew was a huge snow-owl. He was the patriarch among all the owls of Pierrot's trapping domain. He was so old that he was almost blind, and therefore he never hunted as other owls hunted. He did not hide himself in the black cover of spruce and balsam tops, or float softly through the night, ready in an instant to swoop down upon his prey. His eyesight was so poor that from a spruce top he could not have seen a rabbit at all, and he might have mistaken a fox for a mouse.

So old Oohoomisew, learning wisdom from experience, hunted from ambush. He would squat on the ground, and for hours at a time he would remain there without making a sound and scarcely moving a feather, waiting with the patience of Job for something to eat to come his way. Now and then he had made mistakes. Twice he had mistaken a lynx for a rabbit, and in the second attack he had lost a foot, so that when he slumbered aloft during the day he hung to his perch with one claw. Crippled, nearly blind, and so old that he had long ago lost the tufts of feathers over his ears, he was still a giant in strength, and when he was angry one could hear the snap of his beak twenty yards away.

For three nights he had been unlucky, and tonight he had been particularly unfortunate. Two rabbits had come his way, and he had lunged at each of them from his cover. The first he had missed entirely; the second had left with him a mouthful of fur—and that was all. He was ravenously hungry, and he was gritting his bill in his bad temper when he heard Baree approaching.

Even if Baree could have seen under the dark bush ahead, and had discovered Oohoomisew ready to dart from his ambush, it is not likely that he would have gone very far aside. His own fighting blood was up. He, too, was ready for war.

Very indistinctly Oohoomisew saw him at last, coming across the little open which he was watching. He squatted down. His feathers ruffled up until he was like a ball of fire. Ten feet away, Baree stopped for a moment and licked his wound. Oohoomisew waited cautiously. Again Baree advanced, passing within six feet of the bush. With a swift hop and a sudden thunder of his powerful wings the great owl was upon him.

This time Baree let out no cry of pain or of fright. The wolf is kipichimao, as the Indians say. No hunter ever heard a trapped wolf whine for mercy at the sting of a bullet or the beat of a club. He dies with his fangs bared. Tonight it was a wolf-whelp that Oohoomisew was attacking, and not a dog-pup. The owl's first rush keeled Baree over, and for a moment he was smothered under the huge, outspread wings, while Oohoomisew—pinioning him down—hopped for a claw hold with his one good foot, and struck fiercely with his beak.

One blow of that beak anywhere about the head would have settled for a rabbit, but at the first thrust Oohoomisew discovered that it was not a rabbit he was holding under his wings. A blood-curdling snarl answered the blow, and Oohoomisew remembered the lynx, his lost foot, and his narrow escape with his life. The old pirate might have beaten a retreat, but Baree was no longer the puppyish Baree of that hour in which he had fought young Papayuchisew. Experience and hardship had aged and strengthened him; his jaws had passed quickly from the bone-licking to the bone-cracking age—and before Oohoomisew could get away, if he was thinking of flight at all, Baree's fangs closed with a vicious snap on his one good leg.

In the stillness of night there rose a still greater thunder of wings, and for a few moments Baree closed his eyes to keep from being blinded by Oohoomisew's furious blows. But he hung on grimly, and as his teeth met through the flesh of the old night pirate's leg, his angry snarl carried defiance to Oohoomisew's ears. Rare good fortune had given him that grip on the leg, and Baree knew that triumph or defeat depended on his ability to hold it. The old owl had no other claw to sink into him, and it was impossible—caught as he was—for him to tear at Baree with his beak. So he continued to beat that thunder of blows with his four-foot wings.

Great English Sailor

Sir Francis Drake, famous navigator of the time of Queen Elizabeth, sailed from Falmouth December 13, 1577, sailed around the globe and returned to England after suffering many hardships, on November 3, 1580. The queen visited Drake on his ship at Deptford April 4, 1581, and conferred upon him the honor of knighthood. He died at Panama January 28, 1596, while engaged in an expedition against the Spaniards, and was buried at sea.

That Did It

Outside the storm raged. The thunder was deafening, the lightning flashed almost continuously. Presently a bolt struck some part of the house and knocked the owner completely out of bed. He rose, rubbed his eyes, yawned, and said, "All right, dear, I'll get up."

Find a Faithful Ally in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

MRS. ADOLPH HANSEN
HOLMQUIST, SOUTH DAKOTA

Holmquist, South Dakota.—"I can not begin to tell you how much good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I was sick for about four years. I could not sleep, and I was always worrying, so one day we saw your advertisement in a paper, and I made up my mind to try the Vegetable Compound. I bought one bottle and did not see any change, so I got another bottle. At the second bottle I began to feel better and I have used the Vegetable Compound ever since, whenever I feel badly. I recommend it and I will answer any letters asking about it."—MRS. ADOLPH HANSEN, Holmquist, South Dakota.

Could Work Only Two Hours

Encanto, Calif.—"I bless the day I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I was so weak and tired all the time I could not work more than two hours each day, then had to go to bed for the rest of the day. I read so much about the Vegetable Compound and I was so weak that I decided to try it. I now do my own housework—washing, scrubbing, and ironing—and then help my husband with his garden. I do not have that worn-out feeling now. I advise every woman to give your wonderful medicine a trial, and I will answer any letters I receive from women asking about it."—MRS. STELLA LAY, 700 Jamacha Road, Encanto, Calif.

A woman who is fighting for her health and her family's happiness is a valiant soldier. She wages her battle in her own kitchen. She has no thrilling bugles to cheer her on, no waving banners.

Drowned in Peculiar Way

On the farm of Charles P. Steele at White Sulphur Springs, N. Y., a cow was drowned though its body was not submerged. It was drinking from a water tank which was partly covered with ice and and caught its head under the ice, where it was held until the animal drowned.

Does Biggest Business

The largest retail business in the United States, according to W. S. Gifford, president of the American Telephone and Telegraph company, is the telephone business. In support of this statement, he says there are about 50,000,000 telephone calls, or transactions, daily.

Among books coming to the Congressional library for the Korean collection are five out of the ten forming the Buddhistic treatise, "Ri Nyon Mi Ta to Ch'ng Cham Pep," translated by Bunyin Nanjio, as "Rules for Confession in the Temple of the Merciful and Compassionate One." The work is printed on Korean mulberry paper from wooden blocks cut in the second year of the Chin (Tartar) Emperor Ch'ung Ch'ing, 1213 A. D. EVERYDAY GOOD THINGS

We all enjoy an occasional unusual dish, but the most of humanity like common things well cooked; if we can be ingenious enough to serve and garnish them that they appear unusual, the more honor to the cook.

Boiled Dinner.—A well-seasoned kettle of boiled dinner is a dish fit to set before the king or queen either. As tastes vary so in regard to flavors, one must use judgment in cooking a boiled dinner. One New England housewife, famous for her cooking, never prepared a boiled dinner without slipping in a salt sack of beans—the cranberry variety—to serve with the dinner. They are so well seasoned with the vegetables and meat that they are especially tasty.

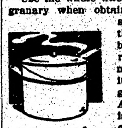
The kind of meat one likes with a boiled dinner will determine the flavor of the whole. Most people like a nice fat piece of corn beef together with a good-sized piece of fresh pork, fat and lean; others prefer salt pork or pigs' feet with salt pork. At any rate enough meat of whatever kind should be started to cook an hour or two before the vegetables are added; this gives a quantity of broth all flavored ready to begin seasoning the vegetables as soon as they are put in. Cabbage, rutabagas, carrots, parsnips, onions and beets cooked by themselves are added to the platter when serving.

Suet Pudding.—Take one cupful of suet, molasses and sour milk, three and one-half cupfuls of flour, two eggs and one cupful of dried fruit. Add a teaspoonful of soda and spices to taste. Steam two hours and serve with:—

Egg Sauce.—Beat two eggs until light, add one cupful of powdered sugar, a teaspoonful of vanilla or lemon extract and three tablespoonfuls of any fruit juice to suit the taste. Beat up and serve with any steamed pudding.

Beet Relish.—This may be made any time when fresh beets are good. To one quart of chopped beets which have been cooked until tender, add one quart of chopped cabbage, one cupful of grated horseradish, one cupful of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of cayenne pepper, and salt to taste; cover with cold vinegar.

Food for Everybody.



Use the whole wheat right from the granary when obtainable. Wash it, soak it over night, then cook on the back part of the range all day if necessary, or until it becomes a soft gelatinous mass. A fireless cooker is a fine place to cook food which needs long, slow cooking. This wheat when served with a little top milk is the best possible food for the youngsters just going to school. Kept in a cool place the wheat may be served two or three times a week and children like it once they have eaten it.

This is the season when steamed puddings and rich sauces are more frequently used. The following is a simple pudding and easy to prepare:

Suet Pudding.—Take three cupfuls of bread, one cupful each of sugar and suet, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, the same of cloves; one cupful each of raisins and milk. Mix thoroughly, adding a bit of grated orange peel and a little grated nutmeg. Steam three hours. Serve with:

Pudding Sauce.—Mix one tablespoonful of flour with one cupful of sugar, add a little cold water, then one cupful of boiling water; cook five minutes, add one-half teaspoonful of grated lemon rind, one teaspoonful of lemon extract, one-fourth teaspoonful of nutmegs, ten drops of ginger or half a teaspoonful of dry ginger, pour over one-half cupful of creamed butter.

Graham Pudding.—Beat one egg, add three-fourths of a cupful of sweet milk, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one-half cupful of graham flour, one teaspoonful of soda, one-half cupful of molasses and one cupful of raisins. Steam two and one-half hours. For the sauce beat the yolks of two eggs, add one-half cupful of sugar, heat in a double boiler; when sugar is dissolved add the beaten whites and serve.

Luncheon Dish.—A few cans of sardines on hand will be found a help in an emergency. For a nice supper or luncheon dish, heat the sardines in a hot frying pan and serve on buttered toast. Serve with raw chopped onion for a relish.

Is Winter Time Your Backache Time?

Does Your Back Foretell Every Change of the Weather? Do You Feel Old and Stiff and Suffer Sharp, Rheumatic Pains?
Then Look to Your Kidneys!

DOES every cold, chill or attack of grip leave you lame, stiff and achy? Are you nervous and depressed; feel tired, worn out and miserable? Does your back throb and ache until it seems you just can't keep going?

Then look to your kidneys! Colds and chills throw a heavy strain on the kidneys. They overload the blood with impurities that the kidneys have to filter off. The kidneys are apt to weaken under this rush of new work, become congested and inflamed.

It's little wonder, then, that every cold finds so many folks suffering with torturing backache, rheumatic pains, headaches, dizziness and annoying kidney irregularities.

If this is the case with you, don't risk neglect! Help your weakened kidneys with a stimulant diuretic. Begin using Doan's Pills. Doan's have helped thousands. Local users testify to their worth. Ask your neighbor!

"Use Doan's," Say These Good People:

A. P. RIVE, farmer, Bottineau, N. D., says: "I was bothered by an irregular condition of my kidneys, that came on when I caught a cold that settled in my back and kidneys. Then my back was lame and achy and hurt, too, when I stooped over or lifted anything. Doan's Pills have always cured me of these attacks."

MRS. G. C. McALESTER, Cando, N. D., says: "I have had more or less trouble with my kidneys for a long time. My back ached and was so lame I could hardly straighten. Sometimes when doing my work about the house I became dizzy and I could hardly see across the room. When these attacks come on, I get Doan's Pills and they always fix me up."

The Refuge

Cortlandt Bleecker said in New York the other day:

"The recent avalanche of divorces—the Valentino divorce, the Widener-Leidy divorce, the Gloria Gould divorce, and so on—make one think there must be something in the widower's remark:

"A widower turned up at his club one night and another member said to him:

"'We've missed you, George. Yes, we've missed you dreadfully. You haven't been near the place since your wife died.'

"'Yes,' said the widower, with a smile. 'Yes, I know. But don't worry. I shall marry again.'"

Evidences of Santa Claus

"Well, I know there is a Santa because on Christmas morning I saw his footprints in the ashes in our fireplace," one held forth as sure proof.

"Huh, I know Santa Claus came to our house, 'cause I saw a toy he drooped in our fireplace just as he started to go up the chimney," said another.

"There is, too, a Santa Claus, 'cause last Christmas he ate a banana at our house and I saw the peeling on our library table when I got up," piped a future President.

Thousands of people who are sufferers from constipation do not become aware of it until they seek out the cause of their frequent headaches.

"Those bilious headaches can be prevented"

"I know how agonizing they are. For years I was a chronic sufferer.

"And the headaches were not the worst part of it. The strong drugs I used to take to relieve the pain upset my stomach and slowly but surely undermined my general health.

"Finally I found out that my headaches were due to constipation. My doctor advised Nujol. After taking it regularly a few weeks the trouble disappeared.

"Since then I have never had another headache. There is no reason why I should, for the cause has been corrected."

Cloth From Pineapples

In France a new fabric that promises to become popular is made from pineapple fiber. It looks like a mixture of cambric and silk. The idea is not essentially new as the natives of Africa have long made their fish nets from the fiber. The fiber does not disintegrate as quickly as cotton material. While the African product is very crude, the skilled process in France makes a superfine cloth, it is said.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Mankato—The Minnesota Historical Society is to conduct its fifth annual summer meeting here June 18 and 19.

Albert Lea—Married women will not be engaged in Albert Lea public schools in the future, Dr. C. L. Blunt, superintendent of the school board, announced.

St. Paul—Oscar Arneson, 47 years old, chief clerk of the Minnesota house of representatives, for 15 years, fell dead a short distance from his home.

Deerwood—O. M. Vanwig, of the First National Bank here, has received word that his cousin, Ivar K. Lykke, of Oslo, has been chosen premier of Norway.

St. Paul—Two St. Paul men, partners in business, were killed by touching a charged radio aerial wire near their icehouse, one of the men dying in a vain attempt to save his friend.

Minneapolis—Through river service from Minneapolis to New Orleans, without reloading, is one of the features of the enlarged river fleet program which is expected to be brought to definite conclusion at Washington.

Minneapolis—Almond L. Krueger, president of the A. L. Krueger Lumber Company and a leading wholesaler of cedar posts and poles in the northwest, died suddenly at Northwestern hospital.

Minneapolis—The annual dinner of the alumni association of the University of Minnesota agricultural college was held, following a business meeting of the association in the afternoon at the University farm.

Duluth—With a crash heard over most of the west end, 150 tons of rock, loosed by a dynamite blast, fell 70 feet from the top of the point of rocks here at Fourteenth avenue west and Superior street.

Anoka—Governor Henry L. Fuqua signed extradition papers ordering Tom Concord, Leo Salmey and John Petersgon brought back to Anoka to face trial on charge of robbing the Anoka National bank at Anoka.

St. Paul—One thousand miles of motorbus routes in Minnesota were tied up as the result of the spring breakup, causing the most serious tieup of highway transportation in the history of the state.

St. Paul—Under the new state law regulating highway crossings have been designated as dangerous and are being equipped with "stop" signs requiring every vehicle to come to a full stop before crossing the tracks.

Duluth—Minnesota women by keeping the subject of forestry alive in their homes and clubs are pushing the state forward as a leading exponent of conservation, A. F. Oppel, assistant state forester, told the Duluth Council of Catholic Women.

Winona—Booms and floats of the public baths were carried down the Mississippi river when the ice went out. Nearly a foot drop in the water levels followed soon after the ice had gone.

Morris—Miss Florence Schroeder, sophomore in the schools here, whose essay on baking powder won first place in a national contest and a trip to Europe for herself and her domestic science teacher, Miss Margaret Randall, of Grand Forks, N. D.

Waubun—Reports received here say that the fish in several of the lakes in Becker county are perishing because the water has become impregnated with dioxide gas, caused by the decomposition of vegetation and the lack of proper aeration of the water.

Kenyon—Cost of transportation, taxation and the low buying power of the dollar are greatly responsible for the farm problem, Governor Theodore Christianson declared here before the Kenyon and South Central Minnesota corn show.

St. Paul—With many Minnesota towns virtually isolated as far as highway transportation is concerned, the road situation showed no marked change as the state highway department placed restrictions on many dirt roads in an effort to save them from more serious damage.

St. Paul—Minnesota counties will spend $18,500,000 on local roads and bridges during 1926, according to a bulletin issued by the state highway department. This is an increase of $540,000 over the same funds last year, and exceeds the state trunk highway budget by $1,500,000.

Minneapolis—Minnesota has approximately 200 women in public office—including mayors, sheriffs, constables, justices of the peace, game wardens and even an excellent "smoke scout" in the forest fire service—a survey made under the auspices of the Minnesota League of Women Voters has revealed.

St. Paul—While the death rate from tuberculosis and cancer is showing a decline in Minnesota, heart disease is taking more lives than ever before and now has the highest death rate in the state, Dr. A. J. Chesley, executive officer on the state board of health said. Last year 3,629 Minnesotans died from heart disease. Cancer was fatal to 2,427 and tuberculosis to 1,586.

St. Paul—Laurence C. "Larry-Ho" Hodgson lead the field of three candidates in the St. Paul primary election for mayor. His opponent on the ticket at the final election May 5 will be the Rev. Howard Y. Williams, pastor of the Peoples church, the Progressive-Labor candidate.

Minneapolis—A gunman, who chased his victim a block after fatally shooting him sent dozens of pedestrians on Hennepin avenue between Sixth and Seventh streets scurrying to shelter behind parked automobiles and [illegible] during the chase.

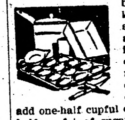
SWEET BREADS



A few cupfuls of raised dough saved from the bread-making may form a basis for many kinds of cakes and sweet breads. For a loaf that is easily made, take two cupfuls of light raised bread dough; to this add one beaten egg, add one-half cupful of shortening, one-half cupful of sugar, spices to taste, with chopped fruits or nuts, or both. Cut in the shortening with the other ingredients, using two knives as in making pastry, then pour into a well-greased angel food pan and let rise until light. Sprinkle with sugar mixed with cinnamon and bake in a moderate oven. Add flour as needed. This combination makes a good coffee cake if rolled out into an oblong loaf. Cover, sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon, and when light bake.

Raised Doughnuts.—To three cupfuls of bread dough add one well-beaten egg, three-fourths of a cupful of sugar, four tablespoonfuls of shortening, one teaspoonful of nutmeg or cinnamon. Cut in with two knives until well mixed; add flour to roll. Roll to one-fourth inch in thickness, cut into shapes and let rise well covered on the bread board until light. Fry in deep fat, hot enough to brown half-inch cubes of bread in one minute. For filled doughnuts, cut the cakes with a cooky cutter, place a spoonful of jam in the center, moisten the edges and fold over, pressing them well together. Let rise until light and fry as usual. Place two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar in a bag and dust them, one at a time, before serving.

Sponge Mixture.—Soak one yeast cake in one-half cupful of cold water; pour off the water and add one teaspoonful of sugar. Warm one and one-third cupfuls of milk, adding the yeast water after it is slightly cool, stir in one teaspoonful of salt and two cupfuls of flour, with the softened yeast. Beat until thoroughly blended, then cover and let stand to rise in a warm place for several hours, until light and full of bubbles. Knead and mix and it is ready for the second rising, adding any desired fruit or sugar combination, depending upon the kind of bread to be made.

Eggless Gingerbread.—Warm together one-half cupful of brown sugar and one cupful of apple jelly with one-third of a cupful of shortening. Remove from the fire, add three-fourths of a cupful of sour milk, two and one-half cupfuls of flour, sifted with one tablespoonful each of ginger and cocoa, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, one and one-half teaspoonfuls of soda and one-half teaspoonful of salt. Mix and beat well until light, pour into a well greased tin and bake forty minutes.

Salads for the Children.

Many mothers have found difficulty in getting the children to eat all kinds of vegetables, and as we know, they are vitally important for the health of a child. It is necessary that every means should be used to start right habits.

Vegetables arranged attractively and well-seasoned with a good mayonnaise dressing, which may be prepared from olive or corn oil, will appeal to most children, and they will eat them with no protest.

Spinach which is so rich in iron when served as a vegetable or soup, becomes repellant to the child, but dressed with bits of bright vegetables, and a good salad dressing, goes without a murmur.

Such fruits as apples, oranges, and pineapples are well-liked by most children, while lettuce, cabbage, carrots, celery and other good vegetables, if dressed with a snappy well-seasoned salad dressing, will be eaten and enjoyed.

In making salad dressings for children and those who have a delicate digestion, lemon should be used instead of vinegar. The lemon juice is rich in vitamines which is lacking in vinegar.

Quick Mayonnaise Dressing.—Take one-half teaspoonful each of mustard, sugar, salt and paprika, add one egg yolk and one-half teaspoonful of lemon juice, beat well then add one tablespoonful of oil drop by drop, beating all the time, then add oil to make three-fourths of a cupful all together with two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice added alternately.

Cabbage, Pineapple and Celery Salad.—Shred firm cabbage very fine, let stand in cold water to crisp. Drain, add a few tablespoonfuls of pineapple and minced celery to each pint of cabbage. Dress with mayonnaise and serve.

Orange Salad.—Remove the pulp from two oranges, cutting them into halves and removing the pulp with a spoon. Arrange on lettuce and serve sprinkled with a teaspoonful of powdered sugar and a generous spoonful of mayonnaise.

A tablespoonful of molasses added to griddle cake batter will make the cakes brown nicely.

The real cause of bad breath

"You cannot 'cover up' unpleasant breath for any length of time. The only way to rid yourself permanently of it is by removing the cause.

"Sometimes poor teeth are responsible. But the commonest cause of a coated tongue and offensive breath is constipation. You may not realize that your intestines are slow in eliminating waste matter, or that your breath is objectionable. But others will notice it.

"Get rid of constipation, and your breath will become fresh and sweet. Even more important, you will notice an immediate improvement in your health and spirits."

Nujol relieves constipation in Nature's own way

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. It does not affect the stomach and is not absorbed by the body. Medical authorities approve Nujol because it is so safe, so gentle, and so natural in its action.

Nujol simply makes up for a deficiency—temporary or chronic—in the supply of natural lubricant in the intestines. It softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination without overtaxing the intestinal muscles.

Nujol can be taken for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly in accordance with the directions on each bottle. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

Ask your druggist for Nujol today. Remove the cause of bad breath and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

Patrons, Attention!

Don't forget to place your order for a Cooling Tank before the weather gets warm. It is communities that have patrons using cooling tanks that produce the best kind of cream during the warm weather.

Cream should be cooled in cold water immediately after separation, both summer and winter. It doesn't take long to cool same if you use a cream stirrer and a pail or two of real cold water. It is the animal heat you want to get out, and it should be gotten out quickly.

Breadfruit.

The breadfruit, with the coconut and banana, furnishes the chief food of the natives of the Pacific islands. That is why we call it "breadfruit," because, for them, it takes the place of bread. Apart from its fruit, the tree itself is a very useful one, for, when beaten out, the inner bark forms a fine white cloth called tapa cloth.

SHORT COURSE WELL ATTENDED

Every County In N. W. Minn. Well Represented.

The fifteenth annual junior short course at the Northwest School, Crookston closed last week with enrollment of 193. Every county of Northwestern Minnesota was represented, according to Supt. C. G. Selvig, who stated that it was a happy, lively and interested group of boys and girls. The work of the week dealt with class room instruction, games, excursions and recreation.

Boys and girls club work received special attention from H. A. Pflughoeft, district club leader in charge. Seven demonstrations among club folks were held including the advanced bread making contest for Northwestern Minnesota. This contest was won by Bertha Strand, Fergus Falls and Marion Thompson, Erhard representing Ottertail county. These girls will next compete for state honors at the State Fair. Other teams to compete were from Hallock, Ulen, Thief River Falls and Detroit.

Heredity Vindicated

It was the day of the school concert, and the audience consisted mainly of mothers, proud or envious, according to the parts that their children were playing.

One small boy came on the platform. Striking a bold attitude, he began: "Friends, Romans, Countrymen, lend me your ears."

"There that's the Joneses boy," she said tartly. "He wouldn't be his mother's son if he weren't trying to borrow something." Ex.

Family of Seven Dies In Williams Tragedy

Last Saturday night an entire family was wiped out in a mysterious fire that destroyed a farm home near Williams, Minnesota. It was certain that the house was standing shortly after midnight as a passerby had seen it, but the next morning a neighbor noticing the house gone went over to investigate and found five bodies in the ruins. A short distance away a little girl was found dead and a little further away the mother was found dead from burns. It had snowed that night and the bodies were partly covered by snow. There was no living witness to the tragedy and a family of father, mother and five children was wiped out completely.

The name of the unfortunates was Mr. Mrs. [illegible] and five children.

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

ON "BAD LUCK"

"The Brownes are the unluckiest people I ever saw, Aunty," remarked Emma, as she and Aunt Emmy walked by their house. "They were just getting on their feet after James lost so much money in stocks. Maud told me only last week that he was putting his savings in government bonds now. Yesterday his office was robbed and the bonds stolen out of his desk. Five $100 bonds gone. It's the only money they have been able to save since he lost his savings in that radio stock."

"That certainly is bad luck, if you call it bad luck," commented Aunt Emmy. "I call it stupidity, myself."

"Stupidity? why Aunt Emmy, how could James know that thieves would get in his office!" exclaimed Emma. "It doesn't seem stupid to me."

"I don't want to be too hard on James, my child, but if he had only used ordinary precautions, he need not have lost what was for him a large amount of money on that radio stock and he surely need not have had those bonds stolen."

"No, of course he isn't. But neither is every successful business man a seer. Luck is ninety per cent common sense. If James had gone to his banker and asked him to look up the radio company whose stock he was thinking of buying, the chances are that he never would have bought it after he got the bank's report. Banks can get the record of any company issuing stock and if the company is not well financed, if it has not been paying dividends, if the officers of the company are not men with clean, honest records, the bank can find that out. The radio company that James invested in made a disgraceful failure a month after he bought his stock. If he had taken the trouble to find out something about it first, doubtless he would have that money today."

"Well, Aunty, that may be true about the stock, but who in the world would anticipate thieves?"

"Anybody who reads the papers today knows that thieves are pretty active," said Aunt Emmy dryly. "Why ignore them? If James had kept his bonds in a safe place, at a bank, he would have had them yet. James has been careless, if not actually stupid. His bad luck is mostly James himself."—Anne B. Aymes.

Iowa Man Wills Land To Savior

Jefferson, Ia., April 3.—(AP) His conviction that material title to all earth reposed with his Lord and Savior, led the late Clarence Powell of this city to will 160 acres of high class Arkansas land to Jesus Christ.

His widow and family are reported to lack the common necessities of life, while officials are worrying about what methods they will employ to carry out Powell's last wishes.

The warranty deed filed with the recorder of deeds at Hardy, Ark., is in regular form except that it reads,

"For and in consideration of the death and penalty that all people inherited, being hereby acknowledged paid by our Lord, Redeemer and Savior, Jesus Christ, who bought the right to possess and control the earth and all things pertaining thereto I surrender all claims."

MINNESOTA EGGS HAVE BIG SALES

Association to Process Over 50 Cars of Eggs this Year.

The Minnesota Co-operative Egg and Poultry association put in a processing machine at its St. Paul plant last week and began processing eggs for its customers. From 50 to 60 carloads of eggs will be processed this year.

Due to its performance last year in furnishing high quality eggs in the quantities and as needed, the Exchange is having a fine demand this spring for its eggs, the demand for top grades exceeding the available supply.

The Land O' Lakes creameries voted to go out of the egg business and are turning that business over to the Egg association, retailing eggs in the Twin Cities and Duluth. In the latter field the associations will cooperate to sell Lake Region Eggs and Land O' Lakes butter together to the retail trade.

The directors of the Exchange voted recently to establish a dressing plant in the Twin Cities which will be done in the near future.

Attended Schoolmen's Banquet At Minneapolis

Supt. Arthur R. Hudson of the Holt Schools attended the Schoolmen's banquet an the Minnesota Union at Minneapolis while home for his Easter vacation. Mr. J. J. McConnell, the Minnesota Commissioner of education stressed the fact that public schools of Minnesota should not be used as common carriers for all institutions which have a message to give the public. Doctors Coffman of Minnesota, Buckingham of Ohio, and Charters of Chicago also spoke.

THE FARMERS COOPERATIVE CREAMERY COMPANY, of Holt, Minnesota at their annual meeting held on the 13th day of February, 1926, brought their articles of incorporation under the provisions of Chapter 326, Laws of 1923, by adopting the following amendments:

Article I. of the articles of incorporation which read:

"I. The name of this corporation shall be The Farmers Cooperative Creamery Company. The nature of its business shall be the manufacture and sale of dairy products, and the purchase and sale of all property required successfully to operate a creamery. Its principal place of business shall be at Sandridge, in Marshall County, Minnesota."

was amended to read as follows:

"I. The name of this corporation shall be The Farmers Cooperative Creamery Company. The purpose of this association shall be to engage in a dairy, manufacturing and marketing business upon the cooperative plan. The nature of its business shall be the construction and maintenance of one creamery, the receiving and buying of milk, cream and other products of the farm, and the manufacture, marketing and selling of butter, cheese, ice cream and other dairy and farm products and the handling and sale of dairy and farm supplies. For such purposes it shall have the power and authority to own, operate, manage and control such creamery and other facilities as may be required in the usual conduct of such business; to purchase and hold, lease, mortgage, encumber, sell, exchange and convey such real estate, buildings and personal property as the business of the association may require; to issue bonds or other evidences of indebtedness; to join with other cooperative associations to form district, state or national marketing and service organisations and to purchase, acquire and hold stock therein; and it shall also have power and authority, either for itself or its individual members and patrons, to do and perform every act and thing necessary and proper to the conduct of its business or the accomplishment of the purposes set forth therein or permitted by the act under which this association is incorporated."

Articles III. which read:

"III. The amount of the capital stock of this corporation shall be $5,000.00 which shall be divided into 200 shares of the par value of $25.00 each, and the same shall be paid for at such times and in such manner as the board of directors may direct, but before this corporation shall commence business at least twenty-five per cent of said stock must be subscribed and paid for."

was amended to read:

"III. The amount of the capital stock of this corporation shall be five thousand dollars ($5,000.00), which shall be divided into two hundred (200) shares of the par value of twenty-five dollars ($25.00) each and the same shall be paid for at such times and in such manner as the board of directors may direct, but no share shall be issued for less than its par value nor until the same has been paid for in cash or its equivalent and such payment has been deposited with the treasurer of the association. The association may commence business whenever twenty (20) per cent of the authorised capital stock has been subscribed and paid in, and the amount of the capital stock outstanding shall at no time be diminished below 20 per cent of the amount of the authorized capital.

The ownership of capital stock in this association by any individual stockholder shall not exceed the par value of one thousand dollars; stockholders shall be restricted to only one vote in the affairs of the association; shares of stock shall not be transferable except with the approval and consent of the governing board of the association; interest (dividends) shall not be paid on outstanding or paid up capital stock of the association in excess of eight per cent (8 per cent) per annum, which shall be non-cumulative; the net income of the association, except such amounts as are required to be set aside as a reserve fund or permanent surplus, or may be set aside by the vote of the stockholders, available for distribution among the members, or both, as the case may be, and as may be prescribed by the by-laws, shall be distributed only on the basis of patronage; voting by proxy shall not be permitted."

Article VII which reads:

"VII. The fiscal year of this association shall begin on the first day of January of each year and close on the 31st day of December of each year."

was added to the articles of incorporation.

Article VIII. which reads:

"VIII. This certificate of incorporation may be amended as provided by law."

was added to the articles of incorporation.

WARY BEAVER

Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more. He strays into the trapping grounds of Pierrot and Nepeese. Nepeese wounds Baree with a rifle, but he escapes.

The wings made a great tumult about Baree, but they did not hurt him. He buried his fangs deeper. His snarls rose more fiercely as he got the taste of Oohoomisew's blood, and through him there surged more hotly the desire to kill this monster of the night, as though in the death of this creature he had the opportunity of avenging himself for all the hurts and hardships that had befallen him since he lost his mother.

Oohoomisew had never felt a great fear until now. The lynx had snapped at him but once—and was gone, leaving him crippled. But the lynx had not snarled in that wolfish way, and it had not hung on. A thousand and one nights Oohoomisew had listened to the wolf-howl. Instinct had told him what it meant. He had seen the packs pass swiftly through the night, and always when they passed he had kept in the deepest shadows. To him, as for all other wild things, the wolf-howl stood for death. But until now, with Baree's fangs buried in his leg, he had never sensed fully the wolf-fear. It had taken it years to enter into his slow, stupid head—but now that it was there, it possessed him as no other thing had ever possessed him in all his life.

Suddenly Oohoomisew ceased his beating and launched himself upward. Like huge fans his powerful wings churned the air, and Baree felt himself lifted suddenly from the earth. Still he held on—and in a moment both bird and beast fell back with a thud.

Oohoomisew tried again. This time he was more successful, and he rose fully six feet into the air with Baree. They fell again. A third time the old outlaw fought to wing himself free of Baree's grip; and then, exhausted, he lay with his giant wings outspread, hissing and cracking his bill.

Under those wings Baree's mind worked with the swift instincts of the killer. Suddenly he changed his hold, burying his fangs into the under part of Oohoomisew's body. They sank into three inches of feathers. Swift as Baree had been, Oohoomisew was equally swift to take advantage of his opportunity. In an instant he had swooped upward. There was a jerk, a rending of feathers from flesh—and Baree was alone on the field of battle.

Baree had not killed, but he had conquered. His first great day—or night—had come. The world was filled with a new promise for him, as vast as the night itself. And after a moment he sat back on his haunches, sniffing the air for his beaten enemy; and then, as if defying the feathered monster to come back and fight to the end, he pointed his sharp little muzzle to the stars and sent forth his first babyish wolf-howl into the night.

Chapter III

Baree's fight with Oohoomisew was good medicine for him. It not only gave him great confidence in himself, but it also cleared the fever of ugliness from his blood. He no longer snapped and snarled at things as he went on through the night.

His wound was much less painful the next day, and by nightfall he scarcely had noticed it at all. Since his almost tragic end at the hands of Nepeese, he had been traveling in a general northeasterly direction, following instinctively the run of the waterways; but his progress had been slow, and when darkness came again he was not more than eight or ten miles from the hole into which he had fallen after the Willow had shot him.

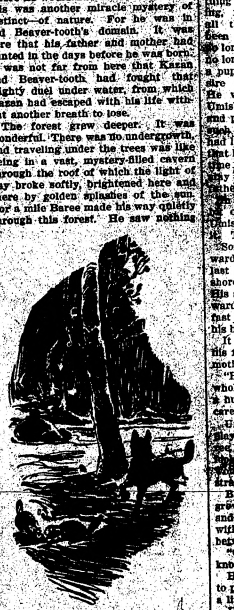
All sounds now held a meaning for Baree. Swiftly he was coming into his knowledge of the wilderness. His eyes gleamed; his blood thrilled. For many minutes at a time he scarcely moved. But of all the sounds that came to him, the wolf-cry thrilled him most. Again and again he listened to it. At times it was far away, so far that it was like a whisper, dying away almost before it reached him; and then again it would come to him full-throated, hot with the breath of the chase, calling him to the red thrill of the hunt, to the wild orgy of torn flesh and running blood—calling, calling, calling. That was it, calling him to his own kin, to the bone of his bone and the flesh of his flesh—to the wild, fierce hunting packs of his mother's tribe! It was Gray Wolf's voice seeking him in the night—Gray Wolf's blood inviting him to the Brotherhood of the Pack.

Baree trembled as he listened. In his throat he whined softly. He edged to the sheer face of a rock. He wanted to go; nature was urging him to go. But the call of the wild was struggling against odds; for in him was the dog, with its generations of subdued and sleeping instincts—and all that night the dog in him kept Baree to the top of his rock.

Next morning Baree found many crawfish along the creek, and he feasted on their succulent flesh until he felt that he would never be hungry again. Nothing had tasted quite so good since he had eaten the partridge of which he had robbed Sekoosew the ermine.

In the middle of the afternoon Baree came into a part of the forest that was very quiet and very peaceful. The creek had deepened. In places its banks swept out until they formed small ponds. Twice he made considerable detours to get around these ponds. He traveled very quietly, listening and watching. Not since the ill-fated day he had left the old windfall had he felt quite so much at home as now. It seemed to him that at last he was treading country which he knew, and where he would find friends. Perhaps this was another miracle mystery of instinct—of nature. For he was in old Beaver-tooth's domain. It was here that his father and mother had hunted in the days before he was born. It was not far from here that Kazan and Beaver-tooth had fought that mighty duel under water, from which Kazan had escaped with his life without another breath to lose.

The forest grew deeper. It was wonderful. There was no undergrowth, and traveling under the trees was like being in a vast, mystery-filled cavern through the roof of which the light of day broke softly, brightened here and there by golden splashes of the sun. For a mile Baree made his way quietly through this forest. He saw nothing but a few winged flittings of birds; there was almost no sound. Then he came to a still larger pond. Around this pond there was a thick growth of alders and willows; the larger trees had thinned out. He saw the glimmer of afternoon sunlight on the water—and then, all at once, he heard life.



I Know How to Play.

There had been few changes in Beaver-tooth's colony since the days of his feud with Kazan and the others. Old Beaver-tooth was still older. He was fatter. He slept a great deal, and perhaps he was less cautious. He was dozing on the great mud-and-brushwood dam of which he had been engineer in chief, when Baree came out softly on a high bank thirty or forty feet away. So noiseless had Baree been that none of the beavers had seen or heard him. He squatted himself flat on his belly, hidden behind a tuft of grass, and with eager interest watched every movement. Beaver-tooth was rousing himself. He stood on his short legs for a moment; then he tilted himself up on his broad, flat tail like a soldier at attention, and with a sudden whistle dived into the pond with a great splash.

In another moment it seemed to Baree that the pond was alive with beavers. Heads and bodies appeared and disappeared, rushing this way and that through the water in a manner that amazed and puzzled him. It was the colony's evening frolic. Tails hit the water like flat boards. Odd whistlings rose above the splashing—and then as suddenly as it had begun, the play came to an end. There were probably twenty beavers, not counting the young, and as if guided by a common signal—something which Baree had not heard—they became so quiet that hardly a sound could be heard in the pond. A few of them sank under the water and disappeared entirely, but most of them Baree could watch as they drew themselves out on shore.

The beavers lost no time in getting at their labor, and Baree watched and listened without so much as rustling a blade of the grass in which he was concealed. He was trying to understand. He was striving to place these curious and comfortable-looking creatures in his knowledge of things. And then, close under him—not more than ten feet from where he lay—he saw something that almost gave voice to the puppyish longing for companionship that was in him.

Down there, on a clean strip of the shore that rose out of the soft mud of the pond, waddled fat little Umisk and three of his playmates. Umisk was just about Baree's age, perhaps a week or two younger. But he was fully as heavy, and almost as wide as he was long. Nature can produce no four-footed creature that is more lovable than a baby beaver, unless it is a baby bear; and Umisk would have taken first prize at any beaver baby show in the world. His three companions were a bit smaller. They came waddling from behind a low willow, making queer little chuckling noises, their little flat tails dragging like tiny sledges behind them. They were fat and furry, and mighty friendly looking to Baree, and his heart beat a sudden, swift pit-a-pat of joy.

But Baree did not move. He scarcely breathed. And then, suddenly, Umisk turned on one of his playmates and bowled him over. Instantly the other two were on Umisk, and the four little beavers rolled over and over, kicking with their short feet and spatting with their tails, and all the time emitting soft little squeaking cries. Baree knew that it was not fight, but frolic. He rose up on his feet. He forgot where he was—forgot everything in the world but those playing, furry balls. For the moment all the hard training nature had been giving him was lost. He was no longer a fighter, no longer a hunter, no longer a seeker after food. He was a puppy, and in him there rose a desire that was greater than hunger. He wanted to go down there with Umisk and his little chums and roll and play. He wanted to tell them, if such a thing were possible, that he had lost his mother and his home, and that he had been having a mighty hard time of it, and that he would like to play with them and their mothers and fathers if they didn't care.

In his throat there came the least bit of a whine. It was so low that Umisk and his playmates did not hear it. They were tremendously busy.

Softly Baree took his first step toward them, and then another—and at last he stood on the narrow strip of shore within half a dozen feet of them. His sharp little ears were pitched forward, and he was wiggling his tail as fast as he could, and every muscle in his body was trembling in anticipation.

It was then that Umisk saw him, and his fat little body became suddenly as motionless as a stone.

"Hello!" said Baree, wiggling his whole body and talking as plainly as a human tongue could talk. "Do you care if I play with you?"

Umisk made no response. His three playmates now had their eyes on Baree. They didn't make a move. They looked stunned. Four pairs of staring, wondering eyes were fixed on the stranger.

Baree made another effort. He groveled on his forelegs, while his tail and hindlegs continued to wiggle, and with a sniff he grabbed a bit of stick between his teeth.

"Come on—let me in," he urged. "I know how to play!"

He tossed the stick in the air as if to prove what he was saying, and gave a little yap.

Umisk and his brothers were like dummies.

And then, of a sudden, some one saw Baree. It was a big beaver swimming down the pond with a sapling timber for the new pond that was under way. Instantly he loosed his hold and faced the shore. And then, like the report of a rifle, there came the crack of his big flat tail on the water—the beaver's signal of danger that on a quiet night can be heard half a mile away.

"Danger," it warned. "Danger—danger—danger!"

Scarcely had the signal gone forth when tails were cracking in all directions—in the pond, in the hidden canals, in the thick willows and alders. To Umisk and his companions they said:

"Run for your lives!"

Baree stood rigid and motionless now. In amazement he watched the four little beavers plunge into the pond and disappear. He heard the sounds of other and heavier bodies striking the water. And then there followed a strange and disquieting silence. Softly Baree whined, and his whine was almost a sobbing cry. Why had Umisk and his little mates run away from him? A great loneliness swept over him—a loneliness greater even than that of his first night away from his mother. He had not found comradeship. And his heart was very sad.

Plants and Animals

From the study of plants we learn how to grow them more efficiently and make the fullest use of plant products; also, because life in plants and animals is similar, if not identical, and as plants lend themselves in some ways more readily than do animals to such observations, any information we can obtain on how plants "work" will almost certainly throw some light on similar functions in animals and human beings.

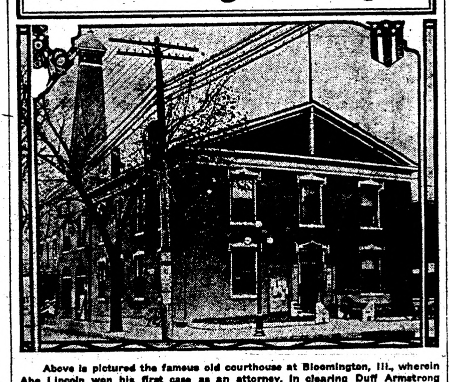
Lincoln's Legal Triumph



Above is pictured the famous old courthouse at Bloomington, Ill., wherein Abe Lincoln won his first case as an attorney, in clearing Duff Armstrong of the charge of murder in 1858. Witnesses swore that they saw Armstrong strike the blow that resulted in the death, "by the light of the moon." Lincoln produced an almanac and showed that there was no moon on the night of the murder and that the witnesses were wrong in their identification of Armstrong, who was subsequently acquitted.

REAL GREATNESS BEYOND LEGEND

Perhaps the one thing to fear for Lincoln's greatness is the growth of legend about it. There is no doubt there is such an incrustation forming upon his fame, and if that process is active so soon after his death, what must be its progress in the centuries to come? What must his real greatness suffer from it? Not in the interest of history alone, but in that of the name and fame of one of the greatest and wisest of Americans, it ought to be the concern of those who are almost his contemporaries to arrest this growth, to remove it so far as it has already obscured the genuine and solid substance beneath and to insist that the qualities that made Abraham Lincoln what he was are sufficient to preserve him, as Edwin M. Stanton said, for the ages.

The reason why Lincoln's greatness lends itself to legend are plain enough. As a national figure he flashed upon the rapidly turning pages of history for but a moment, and was gone before his countrymen came to know him. His entire career, it may be said, covered only four years, something perhaps unprecedented in the annals of the great. Before he became President he was a country lawyer, almost unknown outside of Illinois. In an instant he burst upon the national horizon like a meteor, lighting up the whole sky, and while the eyes of millions were yet upon him trying to make out this sudden portent, he vanished leaving his countrymen and the world with a question unanswered. The attempts to answer it have had a natural result: the Illinois circuit-riding lawyer has become the legal peer of Coke and Mansfield and Marshall; the President who had never seen an army until he was fifty-two years old has become a military genius; the prairie debater has taken his place with the world's first orators; the lonely, sad, overburdened leader of a nation crying out in its travail is a mystic and a poet.

Don't Account for Lincoln.

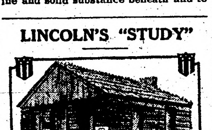
There is some truth in all of these things, but not enough in any one of them to account for Lincoln; there have been greater American lawyers, military leaders, orators and poets, yet none of them was a Lincoln. He knew and could expound the law, but this was perhaps more successfully demonstrated in his debate with Douglas than in his practice at the Illinois bar. He acquired a certain shrewd military knowledge and insight, but this was chiefly remarkable as showing the extraordinary powers of his logical mind; its practical value in the direction of the northern armies is debatable. We think the second inaugural, which is carved in marble on the walls of the Lincoln memorial in Washington, ranks with the highest poetry of the Bible, on which, indeed, it was modeled. The Gettysburg address reaches the topmost note of human eloquence

Lowell's Eulogy Lives.

But these qualities of mind and these achievements of painstaking and often groping effort do not account for Abraham Lincoln, declares the Kansas City Star. James Russell Lowell accounted for him in a few simple words. "This patient, kindly, wise, foreseeing man." In 1861 the nation could not have been led by the greatest lawyer, military genius, orator or poet. If Lincoln had been all of these and nothing more he must have failed. Hating slavery he dared not strike it; the North was not ready. Hating war he dared to make it, yet had to make it gently—often a fatal thing and almost fatal then; his task was to hold the North and the border states with one hand and strike or beckon the South with the other—he hardly knew which to do and first and last did both. He had to find leaders for the armies, to keep Europe off the North's back, to placate and disarm powerful foes in his own party, to fight battles when victory was almost as terrible as defeat in this war of brothers, to shed civil blood and yet preserve the nation and to lead at last the public opinion of the North to the inevitable necessity of emancipation. "This patient, kindly, wise, foreseeing man" accomplished the task, and history's tribute to him must be the recognition that a Seward, a Chase, a Stanton, a Grant could not have done it. Lincoln led the North slowly because the North would be led no other way. A swifter military success might have been obtained by a Napoleon, but a military success achieved before the North had learned that the war could end only in the destruction of its cause would not have preserved the Union.

Lincoln will grow—is growing—with the knowledge of his countrymen that his true greatness was in these qualities of leadership that went down to the character and fiber of the man; to his simplicity, honesty, wisdom, forebearance, truthfulness and mercy. In these was his power over men, in his time and ours.

LINCOLN'S "STUDY"



The picture shows the Onstott cooper shop at New Salem, Ill., which is rich with historical interest. It was in this building that Abraham Lincoln studied law by the side of the fireplace, the only light available. The fire was fed with shavings so that Lincoln could see to study. The building today appears very much the same as it did during Lincoln's time, and the original logs yet remain.

GIANT AMONG MEN

Lincoln's Wisdom

It is better only sometimes to be right than at all times to be wrong. Before I resolve to do one thing or the other I must gain my confidence in my own ability to keep my resolves when they are made.—Lincoln.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

JUST what tact, that most indispensable part of social life, really is even Webster finds it hard to define concretely. But perhaps one of the best illustrations of its nature came from the lips of a friend of mine, Brig. Gen. Thornwell Mullally, U. S. A.

A negro, he told me, had achieved the rank of orderly to a captain of the expeditionary forces. In the latter's absence the negro was left in charge, with the warning to treat his white command with tact. Sam assured the captain that tact was his long suit, but after the officer's departure he looked up a colored friend and told him what his instructions were.

"Now," inquired Sam, "what is dishayere tact? I got to know how to do it."

"Ah'll enlighten yore intelleck," replied his friend. "When Ah wuz back in de States, Ah wuz wukkin' at de Waldawf. One day, when Ah wuz shoffeh to a vacurum-cleaneh, Ah opened a barfoom doh, and dah wuz a lady a-settin' in de tub. Ah shet dat doh quick an' sez: 'Beg yo pahdon—suh.' Dat 'Beg yo pahdon' was jes' p'liteness, but boy, dat 'suh' wuz tact."

Once when Irvin Cobb came to see me and asked me how I felt, I told him I had a pain in my "abandon," as Tom Ryan used to say in vaudeville. He came back with the information that that meant I was sick all over.

"How's the back?" he inquired, so I let him in on the secret that if I put my hand on both my pains at once, I would be doing a sailor's hornpipe. While he was with me, E. F. Albee, president of the B. F. Keith circuit of theaters, came in.

"Can I drop you some place?" he wanted to know of Mr. Cobb.

"No, thanks. I'm just getting over the last drop I had some place," retorted the gentleman from Paducah.

"Come on. Take a ride in my Ford," urged Mr. Albee. That was the best part of it. The man who thinks nothing of building a $5,000,000 theater drives around New York in a Ford.

Recently a friend sent me a story to illustrate what he meant by the acme of pointless ambition. The fame of monkey glands, it seemed had reached even the rural communities of New Hampshire and one day the village doctor was surprised by a call from the oldest inhabitant.

"Doc," said the graybeard, "what's all this gland business I read about? Do you think you could do anything to make me live to a hundred years?"

"Well, I don't know," said the doctor, sizing the old chap up. "How are your habits? How have you lived? Do you drink?"

"Never took a drink in my life." "Use tobacco?" "Never." "How is your appetite? Eat much meat?" "Nope. I'm a vegetarian." "Married?" "No, sir. Never have and never will be."

Then he burst out: "What the devil do you want to live a hundred years for?"

Roy K. Moulton, the columnist, has brought me many a laugh by his writings and more than once a tear. A paragraph of his which caused a lump in my throat was about a trip to the seashore.

"We were on our way to Long Beach," he wrote, "to take a swim. The car was not working properly and when we arrived at our destination after some delay we were ill-tempered. On the beach we found about seventy-five crippled children. They were in bathing suits. Some could only get around by crawling on their hands and knees. Three young girls with soft, sweet faces pulled themselves along the sand with their hands. One little colored girl hopped along like a toad. They were all laughing and having a good time. We watched them for a while and then joined in the fun."

He did not have to append a moral for everyone who read the paragraph must have wondered what healthy people had to become ill-tempered about.

It was amazing to one who had been shut in for five years to see how styles have changed in that time. I don't mean only clothes, for everyone would be disappointed if they didn't change three times a year.

When I left Broadway taxicabs were any color; now they've all got jaundice, while store fronts, methods of window display, the traffic-control system, electric sign messages and almost everything else, all have altered, though it probably has been imperceptible to those who have seen it happen day by day.

Even styles in musical comedy are different, and for the benefit of those who prate about "the good old days" my opinion is that present fashions are better. So far as I have been able to observe human nature hasn't changed—thank God.

Is your car a General Motors Car?

IF YOU own a Chevrolet, a Pontiac, an Oldsmobile, an Oakland, a Buick or a Cadillac, you own a General Motors car.

"But what," you may ask, "does that mean to me?" It means just this:

General Motors is a family of companies building motor cars and trucks and such other famous automotive products as Fisher Bodies, Delco and Remy electrical systems, Harrison radiators and AC spark plugs. Still other General Motors products are Delco-Light electric power plants and Frigidaire electric refrigerators. There are General Motors plants in 44 cities, employing 120,000 people; and sales and service organizations in 144 countries.

General Motors uses the combined resources of this great family for the benefit of each member. It effects great savings in the purchase of quality materials; it provides the best of engineering talent; it maintains the world's largest research laboratories and proving ground for automobiles; and it assures the permanence of its various divisions and the products which they make.

In other words, General Motors has every facility and every incentive to maintain quality and to offer value for the price; and the current models of General Motors cars are offered as the greatest values in the history of the automobile industry.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

"THE Patients' Husbands' club" is what we called them in the hospital where I once spent four years. It is a club whose initiation fee and dues are paid in heart pangs. It was interesting to watch these husbands of the different patients, to see the "when a feller needs a friend" look and attempt at bravery when facing bad news. If ever there was a doubt in my mind about men being but boys grown up it vanished after I had watched a few score of men pace the floor while their wives were in the operating room.

It is then that a man needs help if ever. I have watched the young newlywed wait for tidings from his bride, and the frightened but adoring expression when he is allowed to see her. Then there is the husband of the middle-aged woman who probably has to do the housework while his wife is in the hospital. He comes in and brings the children. I have more than once heard the husband rehearsing the children as to what they should or should not say, lest they "make mamma sorry."

There is the fine old gentleman whose white-haired wife is fighting her way back to life and who walks the floor anxiously until he is permitted to see "mother." They sit together for hours, not a word passing between them, though she seems happy just to know he is there. His solicitude for her comfort and her daily watch for his appearance refute what the cynics say about the fading of romance.

These worried men provoked other thoughts and whenever I saw the husband of some fellow-patient fidgeting outside the room in which his wife was being treated I could not but wonder if he were always so solicitous about her. Had he been careless or indifferent in his attentions to her, and now, when there was a possibility of losing her, was he just learning to appreciate what she meant to him? Perhaps; but there was always the hope that the cloud hanging over them would soon roll away and reveal a silver lining of renewed confidence and rekindled love made stronger by suffering.

If it weren't for the fact that I'm such a bad sailor that I get seasick going across the river on a ferry, I'd like to be an officer on some big ocean liner. I love good stories and there is where they abound. Charles Spedding, purser of the Aquitania, visits me at the New York end of each trip and every time he has a fund of good stories. Here is one of his prizes, which he brought recently:

Sir Arthur Sullivan, of Gilbert and Sullivan fame, started out with a friend to make a call in London. Both men knew the street upon which the object of their search lived, and even remembered the right block, but neither could recall the number of the house. To further complicate matters all the homes had been turned out of the same mold.

"What'll we do?" asked Sir Arthur's friend.

He got no answer, for the great composer had suddenly left him. The friend followed him curiously and saw him go to the first house, brush his shoe against the foot scraper and listen intently. He shook his head and repeated the performance at the next house. From doorstep to doorstep he proceeded, with his wondering friend at his heels. At last he stopped before a residence in the middle of the block.

"This is it," he announced. "I don't know the number, but the foot scraper is in B flat."

Frank Kahlo, who lives in Evanston, near which is Chicago, travels far and wide through the states of the Middle West and in his travels has found a mate for the subway rider who always sits with his gaze at the floor because he hates to see women standing in the aisle.

Some time ago Mr. Kahlo spent several weeks in a village in southeastern Ohio, and he is willing to state under oath that the hotel proprietor there was the laziest human being living. The only work he performed in all the time my informant stayed there was to cross the street one day for some chewing tobacco. On the other hand, his wife stood over a hot range the day long in the sultry July weather, cooking meals for from fifteen to twenty adults. In her spare moments she washed the dishes, made the beds, did her own washing and ironing and looked after two small children.

One particularly blazing afternoon, as the landlord and Mr. Kahlo sat in the shade of a tree with their chairs tilted back against the wall, the proprietor remarked that he had only been running the hotel a few months, having had a barber shop before then.

"How do you like the hotel business?" asked Mr. Kahlo.

"Wal," said the landlord with a sigh," I like it fine, but it's certainly h—l on the wife."

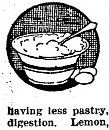
TIMELY DESSERTS



For the early spring months, having tired of heavy rich desserts, we turn with enjoyment to lighter and easier digested dishes.

Pie is so well liked that it is more often served than any other dessert. When it is served with a filling as an open pie, having less pastry, it is more easy of digestion. Lemon, custard, and different fruit pies are all among this class of pies. The following is a good lemon pie:

Queen of Lemon Pie.—Beat the yolks of three eggs. To one cupful of sugar add a tablespoonful of butter; when well creamed add a tablespoonful of flour and mix with the eggs. Grate the yellow rind of a lemon and squeeze the juice, add with one cupful of milk to the other mixture. Beat the whites of three eggs until stiff and fold in lightly, then pour into a lined pastry shell, unbaked. Bake slowly until thick and well browned.

Delmonico Pudding.—Turn a pint can of peaches with the sirup into a pudding dish. Heat one pint of milk in a double boiler, add one-third of a cupful of cornstarch stirred to a smooth paste with one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-half cupful of cold milk. Stir and cook in the hot milk until the cornstarch is thoroughly cooked. Cover and let stand for a few minutes. Beat the yolks of two eggs, add one-third of a cupful of sugar, beat again, add to the hot mixture, continue beating until the egg is cooked, then pour over the peaches. Beat the egg whites until stiff, add four tablespoonfuls of sugar, cover the pudding and place in a slow oven at first, then brown quickly. Serve either hot or cold.

Prune Patties.—Take one-half cupful of stewed prunes, stone and mash, add one beaten egg yolk, a pinch of salt, a grating of nutmeg, a teaspoonful of flour and sugar to taste, a half cupful of sweet milk. Mix and pour into pastry-lined patty pans. Bake until a light brown. Spread the tops with a meringue made from the egg white and a little sugar. Brown lightly in a moderate oven.

Maple Junket.—Warm just lukewarm, one quart of milk, add one dissolved junket tablet, one-third of a cupful of maple sugar and pour into sherbet cups. Serve when firm with grated maple sugar and cream. If the maple sugar is not to be obtained use brown sugar with a few drops of maple flavoring.

Dresden Crumbs.—Melt chocolate and stir in as many dry, finely grated crumbs as the chocolate will cover. Serve with cream and sugar.

Food Suggestions.

A pretty salad for a party is prepared as follows: Place a slice of pineapple on a tender lettuce leaf; in the center of the pineapple place half of a banana and top with a red cherry. Pass salad dressing or heap a spoonful on the side of the salad.

Cream of Onion Soup.—Slice four onions and cook in boiling water until soft, changing the water once during the cooking. When tender, rub the onions through a sieve and to a cupful of the pulp, prepare the following: Melt a tablespoonful of butter; when hot add two tablespoonfuls of flour. Stir until the mixture leaves the sides of the pan, then add three cupfuls of cold milk and cook until smooth; after ten minutes add the onion and the liquid in which they were cooked. Boil up once and serve.

Hot Water Ginger Bread.—Take one cupful of sugar, one beaten egg, a half teaspoonful of salt, one-half cupful of melted shortening a tablespoonful of ginger, one cupful of molasses, and three cupfuls of flour. Mix and stir until well blended, then add one cupful of boiling water into which is stirred a scant teaspoonful of soda. Stir and beat until well mixed, then pour into a well-greased dripping pan and bake 40 minutes. Serve hot, cut into squares with cottage cheese and apple sauce. This dessert is especially good with whipped cream.

Salsify Soup.—Scrape and clean three bunches of salsify cut into dice and soak for 15 minutes in cold water. Drain, cover with boiling water and cook until tender. Add a quart of milk, butter, salt and pepper to season. Bring to the boiling point, add three milk crackers (rolled) and serve at once.

Spanish Eggs.—Cook together one cupful of stewed tomatoes and a clove of garlic finely minced, one chopped onion, two sweet green peppers chopped. Cook gently until reduced to half. Spread on thin slices of buttered toast and lay a poached egg on each slice.

Hash Roll.—Prepare a rich biscuit dough and roll out one-half inch thick. Spread with hot, moist and well-seasoned hash. Roll up and bake in a hot oven. Serve on a hot platter with a rich brown or tomato sauce.

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE
Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound
Mrs. Annie Kwinski of 526 1st Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., writes that she became so weak and run-down that she was not able to do her housework. She saw the name Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the paper and said to her husband, "I will try that medicine and see if it will help me." She says she took six bottles and is feeling much better.
Mrs. Mattie Adams, who lives in Downing Street, Brewton, Ala., writes as follows: "A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and since taking it I feel like a different woman."
With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grand-children, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.
Thousands of women past fifty, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and are recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

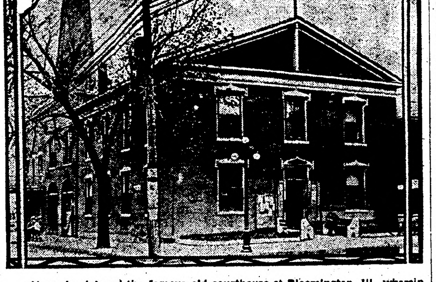
Lincoln's Legal Triumph



Above is pictured the famous old courthouse at Bloomington, Ill., wherein Abe Lincoln won his first case as an attorney, in clearing Duff Armstrong of the charge of murder in 1858. Witnesses swore that they saw Armstrong strike the blow that resulted in the death, "by the light of the moon." Lincoln produced an almanac and showed that there was no moon on the night of the murder and that the witnesses were wrong in their identification of Armstrong, who was subsequently acquitted.

REAL GREATNESS BEYOND LEGEND

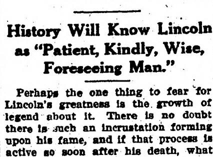
Perhaps the one thing to fear for Lincoln's greatness is the growth of legend about it. There is no doubt there is such an incrustation forming upon his fame, and if that process is active so soon after his death, what must be its progress in the centuries to come? What must his real greatness suffer from it? Not in the interest of history alone, but in that of the name and fame of one of the greatest and wisest of Americans, it ought to be the concern of those who are almost his contemporaries to arrest this growth, to remove it so far as it has already obscured the genuine and solid substance beneath and to insist that the qualities that made Abraham Lincoln what he was are sufficient to preserve him, as Edwin M. Stanton said, for the ages.

LINCOLN'S "STUDY"



The picture shows the Onstott cooper shop at New Salem, Ill., which is rich with historical interest. It was in this building that Abraham Lincoln studied law by the side of the fireplace, the only light available. The fire was fed with shavings so that Lincoln could see to study. The building today appears very much the same as it did during Lincoln's time, and the original logs yet remain.

The reason why Lincoln's greatness lends itself to legend are plain enough. As a national figure he flashed upon the rapidly turning pages of history for but a moment, and was gone before his countrymen came to know him. His entire career, it may be said, covered only four years, something perhaps unprecedented in the annals of the great. Before he became President he was a country lawyer, almost unknown outside of Illinois. In an instant he burst upon the national horizon like a meteor, lighting up the whole sky, and while the eyes of millions were yet upon him trying to make out this sudden portent, he vanished leaving his countrymen and the world with a question unanswered. The attempts to answer it have had a natural result: the Illinois circuit-riding lawyer has become the legal peer of Coke and Mansfield and Marshall; the President who had never seen an army until he was fifty-two years old has become a military genius; the prairie debater has taken his place with the world's first orators; the lonely, sad, overburdened leader of a nation crying out in its travail is a mystic and a poet.

Don't Account for Lincoln.

There is some truth in all of these things, but not enough in any one of them to account for Lincoln; there have been greater American lawyers, military leaders, orators and poets, yet none of them was a Lincoln. He knew and could expound the law, but this was perhaps more successfully demonstrated in his debate with Douglas than in his practice at the Illinois bar. He acquired a certain shrewd military knowledge and insight, but this was chiefly remarkable as showing the extraordinary powers of his logical mind; its practical value in the direction of the northern armies is debatable. We think the second inaugural, which is carved in marble on the walls of the Lincoln memorial in Washington, ranks with the highest poetry of the Bible, on which, indeed, it was modeled. The Gettysburg address reaches the topmost note of human eloquence

Lowell's Eulogy Lives.

But these qualities of mind and these achievements of painstaking and often groping effort do not account for Abraham Lincoln, declares the Kansas City Star. James Russell Lowell accounted for him in a few simple words. "This patient, kindly, wise, foreseeing man." In 1861 the nation could not have been led by the greatest lawyer, military genius, orator or poet. If Lincoln had been all of these and nothing more he must have failed. Hating slavery he dared not strike it; the North was not ready. Hating war he dared to make it, yet had to make it gently—often a fatal thing and almost fatal then; his task was to hold the North and the border states with one hand and strike or beckon the South with the other—he hardly knew which to do and first and last did both. He had to find leaders for the armies, to keep Europe off the North's back, to placate and disarm powerful foes in his own party, to fight battles when victory was almost as terrible as defeat in this war of brothers, to shed civil blood and yet preserve the nation and to lead at last the public opinion of the North to the inevitable necessity of emancipation. "This patient, kindly, wise, foreseeing man" accomplished the task, and history's tribute to him must be the recognition that a Seward, a Chase, a Stanton, a Grant could not have done it. Lincoln led the North slowly because the North would be led no other way. A swifter military success might have been obtained by a Napoleon, but a military success achieved before the North had learned that the war could end only in the destruction of its cause would not have preserved the Union.

Lincoln will grow—is growing—with the knowledge of his countrymen that his true greatness was in these qualities of leadership that went down to the character and fiber of the man; to his simplicity, honesty, wisdom, forebearance, truthfulness and mercy. In these was his power over men, in his time and ours.

GIANT AMONG MEN

Lincoln's Wisdom

It is better only sometimes to be right than at all times to be wrong. Before I resolve to do one thing or the other I must gain my confidence in my own ability to keep my resolves when they are made.—Lincoln.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

JUST what tact, that most indispensable part of social life, really is even Webster finds it hard to define concretely. But perhaps one of the best illustrations of its nature came from the lips of a friend of mine, Brig. Gen. Thornwell Mullally, U. S. A.

A negro, he told me, had achieved the rank of orderly to a captain of the expeditionary forces. In the latter's absence the negro was left in charge, with the warning to treat his white command with tact. Sam assured the captain that tact was his long suit, but after the officer's departure he looked up a colored friend and told him what his instructions were.

"Now," inquired Sam, "what is dishayere tact? I got to know how to do it."

"Ah'll enlighten yore intelleck," replied his friend. "When Ah wuz back in de States, Ah wuz wukkin' at de Waldawf. One day, when Ah wuz shoffeh to a vacurum-cleaneh, Ah opened a barfoom doh, and dah wuz a lady a-settin' in de tub. Ah shet dat doh quick an' sez: 'Beg yo pahdon—suh.' Dat 'Beg yo pahdon' was jes' p'liteness, but boy, dat 'suh' wuz tact."

Once when Irvin Cobb came to see me and asked me how I felt, I told him I had a pain in my "abandon," as Tom Ryan used to say in vaudeville. He came back with the information that that meant I was sick all over.

"How's the back?" he inquired, so I let him in on the secret that if I put my hand on both my pains at once, I would be doing a sailor's hornpipe. While he was with me, E. F. Albee, president of the B. F. Keith circuit of theaters, came in.

"Can I drop you some place?" he wanted to know of Mr. Cobb.

"No, thanks. I'm just getting over the last drop I had some place," retorted the gentleman from Paducah.

"Come on. Take a ride in my Ford," urged Mr. Albee. That was the best part of it. The man who thinks nothing of building a $5,000,000 theater drives around New York in a Ford.

Recently a friend sent me a story to illustrate what he meant by the acme of pointless ambition. The fame of monkey glands, it seemed had reached even the rural communities of New Hampshire and one day the village doctor was surprised by a call from the oldest inhabitant.

"Doc," said the graybeard, "what's all this gland business I read about? Do you think you could do anything to make me live to a hundred years?"

"Well, I don't know," said the doctor, sizing the old chap up. "How are your habits? How have you lived? Do you drink?"

"Never took a drink in my life." "Use tobacco?" "Never." "How is your appetite? Eat much meat?" "Nope. I'm a vegetarian." "Married?" "No, sir. Never have and never will be."

Then he burst out: "What the devil do you want to live a hundred years for?"

Roy K. Moulton, the columnist, has brought me many a laugh by his writings and more than once a tear. A paragraph of his which caused a lump in my throat was about a trip to the seashore.

"We were on our way to Long Beach," he wrote, "to take a swim. The car was not working properly and when we arrived at our destination after some delay we were ill-tempered. On the beach we found about seventy-five crippled children. They were in bathing suits. Some could only get around by crawling on their hands and knees. Three young girls with soft, sweet faces pulled themselves along the sand with their hands. One little colored girl hopped along like a toad. They were all laughing and having a good time. We watched them for a while and then joined in the fun."

He did not have to append a moral for everyone who read the paragraph must have wondered what healthy people had to become ill-tempered about.

It was amazing to one who had been shut in for five years to see how styles have changed in that time. I don't mean only clothes, for everyone would be disappointed if they didn't change three times a year.

When I left Broadway taxicabs were any color; now they've all got jaundice, while store fronts, methods of window display, the traffic-control system, electric sign messages and almost everything else, all have altered, though it probably has been imperceptible to those who have seen it happen day by day.

Even styles in musical comedy are different, and for the benefit of those who prate about "the good old days" my opinion is that present fashions are better. So far as I have been able to observe human nature hasn't changed—thank God.

Is your car a General Motors Car?

IF YOU own a Chevrolet, a Pontiac, an Oldsmobile, an Oakland, a Buick or a Cadillac, you own a General Motors car.

"But what," you may ask, "does that mean to me?" It means just this:

General Motors is a family of companies building motor cars and trucks and such other famous automotive products as Fisher Bodies, Delco and Remy electrical systems, Harrison radiators and AC spark plugs. Still other General Motors products are Delco-Light electric power plants and Frigidaire electric refrigerators. There are General Motors plants in 44 cities, employing 120,000 people; and sales and service organizations in 144 countries.

General Motors uses the combined resources of this great family for the benefit of each member. It effects great savings in the purchase of quality materials; it provides the best of engineering talent; it maintains the world's largest research laboratories and proving ground for automobiles; and it assures the permanence of its various divisions and the products which they make.

In other words, General Motors has every facility and every incentive to maintain quality and to offer value for the price; and the current models of General Motors cars are offered as the greatest values in the history of the automobile industry.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

"THE Patients' Husbands' club" is what we called them in the hospital where I once spent four years. It is a club whose initiation fee and dues are paid in heart pangs. It was interesting to watch these husbands of the different patients, to see the "when a feller needs a friend" look and attempt at bravery when facing bad news. If ever there was a doubt in my mind about men being but boys grown up it vanished after I had watched a few score of men pace the floor while their wives were in the operating room.

It is then that a man needs help if ever. I have watched the young newlywed wait for tidings from his bride, and the frightened but adoring expression when he is allowed to see her. Then there is the husband of the middle-aged woman who probably has to do the housework while his wife is in the hospital. He comes in and brings the children. I have more than once heard the husband rehearsing the children as to what they should or should not say, lest they "make mamma sorry."

There is the fine old gentleman whose white-haired wife is fighting her way back to life and who walks the floor anxiously until he is permitted to see "mother." They sit together for hours, not a word passing between them, though she seems happy just to know he is there. His solicitude for her comfort and her daily watch for his appearance refute what the cynics say about the fading of romance.

These worried men provoked other thoughts and whenever I saw the husband of some fellow-patient fidgeting outside the room in which his wife was being treated I could not but wonder if he were always so solicitous about her. Had he been careless or indifferent in his attentions to her, and now, when there was a possibility of losing her, was he just learning to appreciate what she meant to him? Perhaps; but there was always the hope that the cloud hanging over them would soon roll away and reveal a silver lining of renewed confidence and rekindled love made stronger by suffering.

If it weren't for the fact that I'm such a bad sailor that I get seasick going across the river on a ferry, I'd like to be an officer on some big ocean liner. I love good stories and there is where they abound. Charles Spedding, purser of the Aquitania, visits me at the New York end of each trip and every time he has a fund of good stories. Here is one of his prizes, which he brought recently:

Sir Arthur Sullivan, of Gilbert and Sullivan fame, started out with a friend to make a call in London. Both men knew the street upon which the object of their search lived, and even remembered the right block, but neither could recall the number of the house. To further complicate matters all the homes had been turned out of the same mold.

"What'll we do?" asked Sir Arthur's friend.

He got no answer, for the great composer had suddenly left him. The friend followed him curiously and saw him go to the first house, brush his shoe against the foot scraper and listen intently. He shook his head and repeated the performance at the next house. From doorstep to doorstep he proceeded, with his wondering friend at his heels. At last he stopped before a residence in the middle of the block.

"This is it," he announced. "I don't know the number, but the foot scraper is in B flat."

Frank Kahlo, who lives in Evanston, near which is Chicago, travels far and wide through the states of the Middle West and in his travels has found a mate for the subway rider who always sits with his gaze at the floor because he hates to see women standing in the aisle.

Some time ago Mr. Kahlo spent several weeks in a village in southeastern Ohio, and he is willing to state under oath that the hotel proprietor there was the laziest human being living. The only work he performed in all the time my informant stayed there was to cross the street one day for some chewing tobacco. On the other hand, his wife stood over a hot range the day long in the sultry July weather, cooking meals for from fifteen to twenty adults. In her spare moments she washed the dishes, made the beds, did her own washing and ironing and looked after two small children.

One particularly blazing afternoon, as the landlord and Mr. Kahlo sat in the shade of a tree with their chairs tilted back against the wall, the proprietor remarked that he had only been running the hotel a few months, having had a barber shop before then.

"How do you like the hotel business?" asked Mr. Kahlo.

"Wal," said the landlord with a sigh," I like it fine, but it's certainly h—l on the wife."

For the benefit of those who attend the opera but really prefer jazz I pass around the advice given me by Edwin Franke Goldman on how to tell classical from popular music.

"If it threatens to break into a tune any minute and doesn't," he asserts, "it's classical."

TIMELY DESSERTS

For the early spring months, having tired of heavy rich desserts, we turn with enjoyment to lighter and easier digested dishes.

Pie is so well liked that it is more often served than any other dessert. When it is served with a filling as an open pie, having less pastry, it is more easy of digestion. Lemon, custard, and different fruit pies are all among this class of pies. The following is a good lemon pie:

Queen of Lemon Pie.—Beat the yolks of three eggs. To one cupful of sugar add a tablespoonful of butter; when well creamed add a tablespoonful of flour and mix with the eggs. Grate the yellow rind of a lemon and squeeze the juice, add with one cupful of milk to the other mixture. Beat the whites of three eggs until stiff and fold in lightly, then pour into a lined pastry shell, unbaked. Bake slowly until thick and well browned.

Delmonico Pudding.—Turn a pint can of peaches with the sirup into a pudding dish. Heat one pint of milk in a double boiler, add one-third of a cupful of cornstarch stirred to a smooth paste with one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-half cupful of cold milk. Stir and cook in the hot milk until the cornstarch is thoroughly cooked. Cover and let stand for a few minutes. Beat the yolks of two eggs, add one-third of a cupful of sugar, beat again, add to the hot mixture, continue beating until the egg is cooked, then pour over the peaches. Beat the egg whites until stiff, add four tablespoonfuls of sugar, cover the pudding and place in a slow oven at first, then brown quickly. Serve either hot or cold.

Prune Patties.—Take one-half cupful of stewed prunes, stone and mash, add one beaten egg yolk, a pinch of salt, a grating of nutmeg, a teaspoonful of flour and sugar to taste, a half cupful of sweet milk. Mix and pour into pastry-lined patty pans. Bake until a light brown. Spread the tops with a meringue made from the egg white and a little sugar. Brown lightly in a moderate oven.

Maple Junket.—Warm just lukewarm, one quart of milk, add one dissolved junket tablet, one-third of a cupful of maple sugar and pour into sherbet cups. Serve when firm with grated maple sugar and cream. If the maple sugar is not to be obtained use brown sugar with a few drops of maple flavoring.

Dresden Crumbs.—Melt chocolate and stir in as many dry, finely grated crumbs as the chocolate will cover. Serve with cream and sugar.

Food Suggestions.

A pretty salad for a party is prepared as follows: Place a slice of pineapple on a tender lettuce leaf; in the center of the pineapple place half of a banana and top with a red cherry. Pass salad dressing or heap a spoonful on the side of the salad.

Cream of Onion Soup.—Slice four onions and cook in boiling water until soft, changing the water once during the cooking. When tender, rub the onions through a sieve and to a cupful of the pulp, prepare the following: Melt a tablespoonful of butter; when hot add two tablespoonfuls of flour. Stir until the mixture leaves the sides of the pan, then add three cupfuls of cold milk and cook until smooth; after ten minutes add the onion and the liquid in which they were cooked. Boil up once and serve.

Hot Water Ginger Bread.—Take one cupful of sugar, one beaten egg, a half teaspoonful of salt, one-half cupful of melted shortening a tablespoonful of ginger, one cupful of molasses, and three cupfuls of flour. Mix and stir until well blended, then add one cupful of boiling water into which is stirred a scant teaspoonful of soda. Stir and beat until well mixed, then pour into a well-greased dripping pan and bake 40 minutes. Serve hot, cut into squares with cottage cheese and apple sauce. This dessert is especially good with whipped cream.

Salsify Soup.—Scrape and clean three bunches of salsify cut into dice and soak for 15 minutes in cold water. Drain, cover with boiling water and cook until tender. Add a quart of milk, butter, salt and pepper to season. Bring to the boiling point, add three milk crackers (rolled) and serve at once.

Spanish Eggs.—Cook together one cupful of stewed tomatoes and a clove of garlic finely minced, one chopped onion, two sweet green peppers chopped. Cook gently until reduced to half. Spread on thin slices of buttered toast and lay a poached egg on each slice.

Hash Roll.—Prepare a rich biscuit dough and roll out one-half inch thick. Spread with hot, moist and well-seasoned hash. Roll up and bake in a hot oven. Serve on a hot platter with a rich brown or tomato sauce.

Builds up weak bodies
"Chronic rheumatism kept me in bed. Nothing seemed to help till I tried Tanlac. After five bottles I was at work, in good shape again. Tanlac drove the rheumatism out of my system." Frank L. Wilkins, 1421 West Michigan St., Duluth, Minn.

From Mother Nature's storehouse we have gathered the roots, barks and herbs which are compounded, under the famous Tanlac formula, to make Tanlac.

If your body is weak and undernourished, if you can't sleep or eat, have stomach trouble or burning rheumatism, just you see how quickly Tanlac can help you back to health and strength.

Don't delay taking Tanlac another day. Stop at your druggist's now and get a bottle of this, the greatest of all tonics. Take Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation.

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE
Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mrs. Annie Kwinski of 526 1st Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., writes that she became so weak and run-down that she was not able to do her housework. She saw the name Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the paper and said to her husband, "I will try that medicine and see if it will help me." She says she took six bottles and is feeling much better.

Mrs. Mattie Adams, who lives in Downing Street, Brewton, Ala., writes as follows: "A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and since taking it I feel like a different woman."

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grand-children, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

Thousands of women past fifty, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and are recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

Patrons, Attention!

Don't forget to place your order for a Cooling Tank before the weather gets warm. It is communities that have patrons using cooling tanks that produce the best kind of cream during the warm weather.

Cream should be cooled in cold water immediately after separation, both summer and winter. It doesn't take long to cool same if you use a cream stirrer and a pail or two of real cold water. It is the animal heat you want to get out, and it should be gotten out quickly.

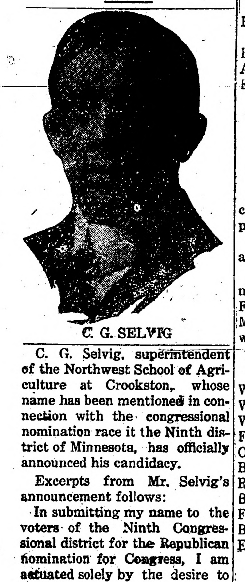
C. G. SELVIG IS REP. CANDIDATE

Popular Ag. School Head Throws Hat In Political Ring



C. G. SELVIG

C. G. Selvig, superintendent of the Northwest School of Agriculture at Crookston, whose name has been mentioned in connection with the congressional nomination race it the Ninth district of Minnesota, has officially announced his candidacy.

Excerpts from Mr. Selvig's announcement follows:

In submitting my name to the voters of the Ninth Congressional district for the Republican nomination for Congress, I am actuated solely by the desire to serve in a larger way the people of my district and state. I am enlisted for life in the cause of agriculture, and the battle line at present, and for some time to come, is in Washington.

Ours is a two party system of government. Issues are fought out and legislation shaped in the committees and party conferences. Third party representation is ineffective. Agriculture cripples itself, in the contest with other groups for equality, when it elects third party men to Congress.

Dr. J. T. Turley, Dentist, will be in Holt Tuesday afternoon April 27th, and Wednesday forenoon Apr. 28th.

NORTHWEST'S "PAIN" TURNED TO GAIN; MARKETING THE "SQUEAL" IS EFFECTIVE PART OF THE DIVERSIFIED TREATMENT

One Montana Farmer Comes To Town with a Single Shipment of Hogs That Brings Him $10,471.05—Fed 'em On Corn Raised On "the Spot."

St. Paul, Minn.—"Out of the 'Pain' of the Northwest, so characterized two years ago by an Eastern writer diagnosing the farmers' depression following the immediate post war period, has grown a healthy condition of material gain as the result of the religious application of remedial treatment known as Diversified Farming," E. C. Leedy, Agricultural Supervisor of the Great Northern Railway announced today.

"The most recent evidence of its effect came to notice the other day when O. E. Spear, a Montana diversifying farmer, arrived in St. Paul with 5 carloads of hogs which brought him $10,471.05 gross. After deducting freight, commission and other expenses of $746.89 he had $9,724.14. There were 377 hogs in the shipment, 233 averaging 230 pounds each which sold to Swift & Company at $12.50 per hundred weight.

"Spear raised these hogs on his ranch 35 miles northwest of Scobey, Montana, 11 miles north and 1 mile west of where the station of Westfork will be on the Scobey-Opheim extension. His farm adjoins the Canadian border. He owns 2320 acres of land, has under cultivation 1350 acres. Of the cultivated land about 800 acres was in wheat last year that averaged a little over 16 bushels to the acre and sold at an average price to him of $1.35 a bushel. The rest of the cultivated land was used for growing about 250 acres of barley, 150 acres of oats and about 100 acres of corn. The balance in millet hay. He grows a small variety of squaw corn and instead of husking it, turns the hogs into it and feeds it off. He estimated that the barley fed to hogs brought $1.00 a bushel.

"He started raising hogs about three years ago and each year has shipped from two to five carloads. He feeds them barley and corn. In addition to hogs he has about 25 head of work horses and up to this year has run a large number of cattle. The past year he has sold the most of his cattle and has bought 700 ewes, intending to build up a flock of sheep.

"He originally located on 240 acres in 1917 after renting land about 50 miles farther east two or three years previous to that. He came originally from Kansas. He uses mostly horses for his farm work. In addition to the 240 acres of land he leased about 10 sections of state land. Three sections of this was used for cultivated crops and the balance for grazing. Last fall at the state land sale he purchased 11 quarter sections of the state land at an average price of $13.53 an acre. Under the terms of state land sales he paid one-tenth in cash and the balance on the amortized plan, 6¼% each year.

"In answering the question as to how much a man ought to have to locate in that country for farming, he stated it was uncertain but that a man ought to have enough to provide a farming out-fit and the amount would depend on the scale of his operations but if he did not have any capital to start up farming he would not hesitate to go to that part of Montana.

"He was one of the subscribers to Great Northern Railway stock that helped to finance the construction of the new line from Scobey to Opheim.

"His farming operations are on a cash basis. He thinks the new railway will be of great advantage to the country and aid in the development of a large amount of land."

Wedding Bells

Word was received here this week that Clara Soiney and Richard J. Letsch were united in marriage at Chisholm, Minnesota Sunday April 4. The bride is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Soiney who live southeast of Holt. The groom lives at Chisholm.

On Wednesday evening Josie Lunke daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ole Lunke and Harry Engen son of Mr. and Mrs. Christian Engen were united in marriage. Rev. M. B. Ordahl tied the nuptial knot.

Emma Lunke and Carl Lunke were the witnesses.

The NEWS extends the most hearty congratulatoins to the contracting parties.

Leonard Swan and family and O. E. Sovde and family spent Sunday visiting at the Edwin Johnson home at Golden Valley.

Fred D. Voth who for the past few years has gone into raising of pure bred Holstein cattle has made some good sales in the last six months. Some time ago Mr. Voth sold a cow to J. Jarland, a bull to Arno Steinhauer, two heifers to Guy Anderson and on Monday he sold a pure bred bull to August Nass.

Cheap Cuttings For Windbreaks

Ag. School Urges R. R. V. Farmers to Plant Now.

The Northwest Experiment Station, Crookston, strongly urges the planting of windbreaks on Red River Valley farms. Upon application the station will furnish 100 willow cuttings upon receipt of 10 cents to cover postage and packing.

Cuttings of willows and cottonwoods when properly planted should make good growth and produce trees large enough for transplanting in one season. Free directions are given for the making of cuttings and planting and growing of seedling trees. Trees can be grown from cuttings and seeds at slight cost and can be transplanted usually without loss.

Many nurseries are offering seedling trees of evergreen and hardwood species at low prices for those wanting trees for immediate planting.

Group of farmers who wish to start windbreaks should write for assistance in windbreak planning and lists of desirable trees. Address, Horticulturist, Northwest Experiment Station, Crookston, Minnesota.

The following names are of those who donated their labor and material for shingling the roof of the Nazareth Lutheran church on Monday.

Women, You Can Be Well

Sioux City, Iowa.—"Many years ago I was suffering from inward weakness brought on thru overwork. My nerves gave way and I could not sleep. I suffered from severe backaches and bearing pains and got so very weak and all rundown that I had to quit my work. I doctored and took medicine but nothing seemed to help me. Upon the advice of a friend I began taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and it restored my nerves, overcame the weakness and completely restored my health."—Mrs. Addie A. Chew, 616 Water St.

THE WAY OF A MAN WITH A MAID

WHEN I WAS TWENTY-ONE

BY JOSEPH KAYE

At Twenty-one Richard Le Gallienne Received His First Commission.

"AT THIS age came my first commission, from Mr. John Lane, to write a book on John Meredith. I had at this time said good-by to the accountant's office where I had been working, rented an old loft in an ancient office building in Liverpool and seriously, as they used to say, 'commenced author.'

I would hardly venture upon the task now, but one is afraid of nothing at twenty-one. So I wrote the book for Mr. Lane and, as a result of it, went up to London. It chanced that just at that moment one of our 'T. P.'s' (T. P. O'Connor) earliest successes, the Star, was about to lose one of its most valued contributors, Mr. Clement Shorter. His column on 'Books and Bookmen' was vacant and open to competition. I took my fling at it, fearfully, as one should essay some inaccessible flight. But, one incredible afternoon it was announced to me that I had been chosen to fill the giant's robe. I was to be paid for writing every Thursday about the books I loved; I was to have my pick of all the books that came into the office—and yet I was to be paid.—Richard Le Gallienne."

TODAY.—Mr. Le Gallienne is one of of the most distinguished poets and essayists of this age—so distinguished, in fact, that the writer recently came across the manuscript of one of his poems offered for sale by Thomas F. Madigan, the autograph dealer. When this happens to any writer he can be certain that he has already achieved the realms of posterity.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

AMONG children it is common after making a false statement to say "over the left." This is frequently uttered in so low a tone that the person addressed cannot hear it; but in the child's mind the "over the left" takes away, or neutralizes, the sin of the lie. If the words are uttered so as to be heard the hearer at once knows that the statement just made is not to be taken as a true one. Among adults, too, the words "over the left" are not infrequently added to a statement to convey the idea that it is to be taken in just an opposite sense; for instance, they change a laudatory statement into a sarcastic comment.

The idea of the power of magical inversion in "over the left" comes entirely from the primitive superstition with regard to right hand and left hand—an idea applied by extension to the right and left of the entire body. The idea, in brief, is that as the right hand is the "right" hand to do things with, the left hand consequently the wrong one, it naturally follows that good resides on the right and evil on the left.

In former times the words "over the left" were considered much more seriously by adults than they are now and believed capable of changing a blessing into a very potent curse. In 1705 one Bevell Waters, having lost a suit in the court at Hartford, Conn., said to the bench as he left the room: "God bless you all—over the left shoulder." The court took expert testimony upon the remark from the two ministers of the two Hartford churches, who declared that Waters had uttered "the words of a curse the most contemptible that can ordinarily be used." Whereupon the culprit was heavily fined.

WHO SAID

"O would I were a boy again,
When life seemed formed of sunny years,
And all the heart then knew of pain
Was wept away in transient tears!"

MARK LEMON, one of the great British humorists of the past century and the author of the lines quoted, is chiefly remembered in the United States as one of the foremost foreign critics and detractors of President Abraham Lincoln, during the Civil war.

Lincoln and Lemon were born in the same year and died within five years of each other. Until the former's death the latter never missed an opportunity to ridicule his handling of the affairs of the United States. When Lincoln died, however, and the wisdom of his course had become apparent, Mark Lemon was one of the first to pen an apology for his criticism. This is in the form of a poem and its obvious sincerity and easy style make it worth reading.

In addition to being a humorous writer Mark Lemon was well known in his day as a capable playwright. During his lifetime he supplied the London stage with more than 60 farces, melodramas and comedies. When the magazine Punch was established in 1841 Lemon became joint editor with Henry Mayhew, and later he was sole editor of the publication. It was in this satirical paper that most of Lemon's jibes at Lincoln were published.

Lemon also achieved some success as a free-lance writer. He contributed to the Illustrated London News, to Dickens' Household Words, Once a-Week, and other periodicals. Among his later works are several novels of average merit. Of all Lemon's works his claim to fame rests most securely upon his work as editor of Punch.—Wayne D. McMurray.

Mother's Cook Book

HEALTHFUL DISHES

Every day is a fresh beginning,
Listen, my soul, to the glad refrain;
And spite old sorrow and older sinning
And puzzles forecasted and possible pain,
Take heart with the day, and begin again.
—Susan Coolidge.

MOTHERS of families should remember to serve onions freely to the whole family, especially to the children. As a seasoning or flavor vegetable, the onion is invaluable, and served as a vegetable at least twice a week, the family will keep in the best of health.

Cream of Onion Soup.

Heat a quart of milk, add two tablespoonfuls of butter and two of flour that have been cooked together, and two cupfuls of cooked onions that have been mashed and put through a strainer. Season with salt, cayenne and a bit of grated cheese. Serve hot with croutons.

Celery Sandwiches.

Mix one cupful of finely chopped celery with one cupful of chopped Jonathan apples and one cupful of chopped English walnut meats. Moisten with mayonnaise. Spread between thin slices of nut bread. Serve with cold roast pork, chicken or turkey.

Onion Salad.

Slice a Spanish onion quite thin, cover with French dressing, adding a teaspoonful of tomato catsup, salt, cayenne, a little vinegar or lemon juice.

Sauce for Fish.

Add grated horseradish to season, to one cupful of thick sour cream. Season with salt, a dash of cayenne and sugar, beat until well-blended and serve with fish, either boiled, steamed or canned salmon.

IN ANY SEASON

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

MY MOTHER'S mother had a way
Of saying things that others say,
But saying them a whole lot better.
I never saw her write a letter,
I never heard her make a speech,
I never heard her really preach,
And yet she said, well I remember:
"The flowers are never out of reach,
I've found them even in December."

She looked for flowers all the year,
And always found the flowers here
When others thought the summer over.
It's easy in the time of clover
To find the blossoms by the wall;
But, when the leaves began to fall,
Perhaps with drifting snow around them,
She looked for flowers, after all,
And mother's mother always found them.

She found them even in her grief,
Yes, she would lift some fallen leaf,
And find some bud forever starting,
Some comfort in the hour of parting.
In every trouble she would find
Some reason for content of mind;
Yes, even in the darkness groping,
When hearts were sore, and eyes were blind,
She always found some cause for hoping.

Her back was bent, her hair was gray,
Yet mother's mother had a way
Of always looking for the roses;
And there are more than man supposes.
It all has helped me quite a lot,
Not only June, but June or not—
I've always tried to find a reason,
However cold the weather got,
For being glad in any season.

AN ABBREVIATED STORY

THE SPORT

"MR. TWILLER SCRATCH?" asked Verna Binnion.

"The same," said Twiller Scratch.

"Oh, I'm so glad to find you in! Us girls are getting up a fund to teach foreign children in America their native language, so they can talk to their fathers and mothers in case the parents can't speak English, and if you would care to—"

"Delighted!" said Twiller Scratch heartily. And he made out a check for $50.

During the next two hours Twiller Scratch bought a set of books entitled, "Eighty Thousand Selected Chinese, Siamese and Portuguese Proverbs," for $9 from a book peddler because the poor devil looked so hard up, subscribed $20 to a fund for sending overshoes to the Dgoo savages in Africa, and gave the office boy $10 for his birthday.

Then he went to lunch with Fred Osprey and insisted on paying the whole check, which came to $8.

"Twiller, you're a sport and everybody knows it," said Osprey as he patted him on the back.

"Not a-tall, not a-tall," said Scratch modestly, as he dropped a dollar bill into a burly beggar's overflowing tin cup.

And in the course of the afternoon he loaned Artie Slatcher $30 and gave a messenger boy a $2 tip.

That evening after dinner his wife said timidly, "Twiller, everything for the table's so high, and I've run a little short of money."

"Money! Money! Money!" snapped Scratch. "Didn't I just hand you a whole five-dollar bill the day before yesterday?"

And he dodged behind the evening paper and didn't come out again till his wife had gone to bed.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Hibbing—Clarence Darrow, Chicago criminal lawyer and opponent of capital punishment, will speak here the latter part of the month, the Tolerance Club announced.

Fergus Falls—Rev. Lorrentz Peter Stenstrom, for 40 years pastor of Swedish Lutheran churches in this county, is dead at his home at Elizabeth, near here.

Duluth—President Francis E. House of the Duluth & Iron Range railway died in a hospital after being taken from his private car when he became ill.

Minneapolis—Daily air mail service between the Twin Cities and Chicago, by way of Milwaukee and La Crosse, has been promised for not later than May 1.

Minneapolis—Plans for establishment of a fourth branch school of agriculture at the Grand Rapids experimental station were announced by W. C. Coffey, dean of the University of Minnesota agriculture department.

Hibbing—Funeral rites for Victor L. Power, 10 times mayor of Hibbing, who was found dead in his bed were conducted at Chicago. He was buried there by the side of his wife, who died five years ago.

St. Paul—Col. Carmi Thompson of Ohio, formerly of St. Paul, has been named by President Coolidge as a special commissioner to the Philippines, to make a study of political and economic conditions there.

Benson—Mayor Leach of Minneapolis opened his campaign for the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota with an address here, under the auspices of the Swift County Leach-for-Governor club.

Hibbing—Special potatoes are bringing the highest price of the year at the municipal market, according to the manager, who states that sales of potatoes at $2.25 and $2.00 a bushel is not uncommon.

St. Paul—A Minnesota girl, Marion Dalley of Macalester college, is winner of the women's extempore speaking contest held in connection with the convention of the Pi Kappa Delta, national debating fraternity, at Estes Park, Colo.

Stillwater—Two young girls pursued a bouncing rubber ball onto thin ice on the river here and were drowned when it broke under their weight. The girls were Irene, 9 years old, daughter of Frank Tullo, and Ollie, 8, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Latturall.

St. Paul—Next fall may go down as the year of the big deer hunt, according to A. E. Pimley, state chief of fire suppression, recently returned from the north woods, who reports deer and moose running in such numbers that they are actually a nuisance.

St. Cloud—A $600,000 addition to the veterans' neuro-psychiatric hospital at St. Cloud, to provide needed facilities for disabled veterans, is proposed in a bill before the house, a dispatch from Washington bureau said.

Northfield—The St. Olaf Lutheran choir is repeating its success of former years. Foremost among the achievements was the record crowd of 6,000 at Milwaukee, where several hundred ticket requests were turned back.

Mankato—A reduction of 17 from the corresponding period of 1925, 68 individuals and firms of 21 southwestern Minnesota counties, filed petitions in bankruptcy in United States court here during the three months ending March 31.

Ortonville—Tracts of land in this vicinity have been covered with ducks feeding in the stubble. Travelers entering here report that a few miles north of here there are hundreds of mallards stopping on their flight north.

Northfield—A conditional gift of $5,000 from K. B. Norswing, of Los Angeles, was announced in the St. Olaf and Luther College endowment drive. The donor stipulated that the drive must attain its goal of $500,000 before the amount is given.

Stillwater—One more chair will be draped in black and turned with its back to the table when the Last Man's club of Stillwater holds it annual meeting this summer. Now there are left only three of that group of 34 Civil veterans who formed the club on July 21, 1885. Emil Graff, 85 years old, was the thirty-first man to have his name engrossed on the rolls among those who have died. His death occurred at St. Cloud, Fla.

St. Paul—Minnesota's playgrounds and agricultural and industrial resources will be advertised in a nation-wide publicity drive to be undertaken during 1926 by the Ten Thousand Lakes association. Governor Christianson soon is to announce the dates of a financial campaign throughout the state to obtain funds for financing the enlarged effort of the association. Frank S. Gold, president of the Minneapolis Automobile club, has been appointed chairman of the financial campaign.

Minneapolis—State-wide advocacy of a legislative appropriation of an additional $1,000,000 for expansion of the university college of agriculture was initiated by the Minneapolis Kiwanis club as a means of speeding greater agricultural, commercial and industrial prosperity for the north.

Anoka—Pleas of not guilty to charges of bank robbery had been entered in District Court at Anoka by four men, three of whom were captured at Shreveport, La., and the fourth who has been held without charge in the Hennepin county jail for two months

Legal Notices

THE FARMERS COOPERATIVE CREAMERY COMPANY, of Holt, Minnesota at their annual meeting held on the 13th day of February, 1926, brought their articles of incorporation under the provisions of Chapter 326, Laws of 1923, by adopting the following amendments:

Article I. of the articles of incorporation which read:

"I. The name of this corporation shall be The Farmers Cooperative Creamery Company. The nature of its business shall be the manufacture and sale of dairy products, and the purchase and sale of all property required successfully to operate a creamery. Its principal place of business shall be at Sandridge, in Marshall County, Minnesota."

was amended to read as follows:

"I. The name of this corporation shall be The Farmers Cooperative Creamery Company. The purpose of this association shall be to engage in a dairy, manufacturing and marketing business upon the cooperative plan. The nature of its business shall be the construction and maintenance of one creamery, the receiving and buying of milk, cream and other products of the farm, and the manufacture, marketing and selling of butter, cheese, ice cream and other dairy and farm products and the handling and sale of dairy and farm supplies. For such purposes it shall have the power and authority to own, operate, manage and control such creamery and other facilities as may be required in the usual conduct of such business; to purchase and hold, lease, mortgage, encumber, sell, exchange and convey such real estate, buildings and personal property as the business of the association may require; to issue bonds or other evidences of indebtedness; to join with other cooperative associations to form district, state or national marketing and service organizations and to purchase, acquire and hold stock therein; and it shall also have power and authority, either for itself or its individual members and patrons, to do and perform every act and thing necessary and proper to the conduct of its business or the accomplishment of the purposes set forth therein or permitted by the act under which this association is incorporated."

Articles III, which read:

"III. The amount of the capital stock of this corporation shall be $5,000.00 which shall be divided into 200 shares of the par value of $25.00 each, and the same shall be paid for at such times and in such manner as the board of directors may direct, but before this corporation shall commence business at least twenty-five per cent of said stock must be subscribed and paid for."

was amended to read:

"III. The amount of the capital stock of this corporation shall be five thousand dollars ($5,000.00), which shall be divided into two hundred (200) shares of the par value of twenty-five dollars ($25.00) each and the same shall be paid for at such times and in such manner as the board of directors may direct, but no share shall be issued for less than its par value nor until the same has been paid for in cash or its equivalent and such payment has been deposited with the treasurer of the association. The association may commence business whenever twenty (20) per cent of the authorized capital stock has been subscribed and paid in, and the amount of the capital stock outstanding shall at no time be diminished below 20 per cent of the amount of the authorized capital.

The ownership of capital stock in this association by any individual stockholder shall not exceed the par value of one thousand dollars; stockholders shall be restricted to only one vote in the affairs of the association; shares of stock shall not be transferable except with the approval and consent of the governing board of the association; interest (dividends) shall not be paid on outstanding or paid up capital stock of the association in excess of eight per cent (8 per cent) per annum, which shall be non-cumulative; the net income of the association, except such amounts as are required to be set aside as a reserve fund or permanent surplus, or may be set aside by the vote of the stockholders, available for distribution among the members, or both, as the case may be, and as may be prescribed by the by-laws, shall be distributed only on the basis of patronage; voting by proxy shall not be permitted."

Article VII which reads:

"VII. The fiscal year of this association shall begin on the first day of January of each year and close on the 31st day of December of each year."

was added to the articles of incorporation.

Article VIII, which reads:

"VIII. This certificate of incorporation may be amended as provided by law."

was added to the articles of incoration.

Chemistry Most Popular

A list of the doctorates (advanced degrees for research) conferred by American colleges in 1925 reveals the interesting fact that chemistry is far in the lead, with a total of 244 doctorates granted. Zoology is next, with 71. At the bottom of the list are meteorology, with 0, paleontology, with 1, and anthropology, with 2. Physics, thought by many to be chemistry's closest rival, in reality claimed only 56 devotees.

Tanlac builds strong bodies

"Before taking Tanlac I was a nervous wreck. Stomach pains kept me awake nights. Even the birds' singing annoyed me. A friend recommended Tanlac; it put me on my feet. Am 69, feel 40." Mrs. S. Spencer, 2109 22d Av. S., Minneapolis, Minn.

There's nothing like Tanlac to purify the blood, put the stomach and liver in working order and build up a run-down body.

Millions of men and women have been benefited by this great tonic and builder that is compounded after the famous Tanlac formula from roots, barks and herbs.

If you are nervous, suffer from indigestion; have rheumatism, torpid liver, buy a bottle of Tanlac at your drug store today. See how you start to improve right from the first. Take Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation.

WAKAYOO

Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more. He strays into the trapping grounds of Pierrot and Nepeese. Nepeese wounds Baree with a rifle, but he escapes. Baree recovers and learns nature's secrets rapidly.

Chapter IV

For two or three days Baree's excursions after food took him farther away from the pond. But each afternoon he returned to it—until the third day, when he discovered a new creek; and Wakayoo. The creek was fully two miles back in the forest. It sang merrily over a gravelly bed and between chasm walls of split rock. It formed deep pools and foaming eddies, and where Baree first struck it, the air trembled with the distant thunder of a waterfall. It was much pleasanter than the dark and silent beaver stream. It seemed possessed of life, and the rush and tumult of it—the song and thunder of the water—gave to Baree entirely new sensations. He made his way along it slowly and cautiously, and it was because of this slowness and caution that he came suddenly and unobserved upon Wakayoo, the big black bear, hard at work fishing.

Wakayoo stood knee-deep in a pool that had formed behind a sand bar, and he was having tremendously good luck. Even as Baree shrunk back, his eyes popping at sight of this monster he had seen but once before, in the gloom of night, one of Wakayoo's big paws sent a great splash of water high in the air, and a fish landed on the pebbly shore. A little while before the suckers had run up the creek in thousands to spawn, and the rapid lowering of the water had caught many of them in these prison pools. Wakayoo's fat, sleek body was evidence of the prosperity this circumstance had brought him. Although it was a little past the "prime" season for bearskins, Wakayoo's coat was splendidly thick and black.

For a quarter of an hour Baree watched him while he knocked fish out of the pool. When at last he stopped there were twenty or thirty fish among the stones, some of them dead and others still flopping. From where he lay flattened out between two rocks, Baree could hear the crunching of flesh and bone as the bear devoured his dinner. It sounded good, and the fresh smell of fish filled him with a craving that had never been roused by crawfish or even partridge.

In spite of his fat and his size, Wakayoo was not a glutton, and after he had eaten his fourth fish he pawed all the others together in a pile, partly covered them by raking up sand and stones with his long claws, and finished his work of caching by breaking down a small balsam sapling so that the fish were entirely concealed. Then he lumbered slowly away in the direction of the rumbling waterfall.

Twenty seconds after the last of Wakayoo had disappeared in a turn of the creek, Baree was under the broken balsam. He dragged out a fish that was still alive. He ate the whole of it, and it was delicious.

Baree now found that Wakayoo had solved the food problem for him, and this day he did not return to the beaver pond, nor the next. The big bear was incessantly fishing up and down the creek, and day after day Baree continued his feasts.

For a week life was exceedingly pleasant. And then came the break—the change that was destined to mean as much for Baree as that other day, long ago, had meant for Kazan, his father, when he killed the man-brute in the edge of the wilderness.

This change came on the day when, in trotting around a great rock near the waterfall, Baree found himself face to face with Pierrot the hunter and Nepeese, the star-eyed girl who had shot him in the edge of the clearing.

It was Nepeese whom he saw first. If it had been Pierrot, he would have turned back quickly. But again the blood of his forebear was rousing strange tremblings within him. Was it like this that the first woman had looked to Kazan?

Baree stood still. Nepeese was not more than twenty feet from him. She sat on a rock, full in the early morning sun, and was brushing out her wonderful hair. Her lips parted. Her eyes shone in an instant like stars. One hand remained poised, weighted with the jet tresses. She recognized him. She saw the white star on his breast and the white tip on his ear, and under her breath she whispered, "Uchi moosis!—"The dog-pup!" It was the wild dog she had shot—and thought had died!

The evening before Pierrot and Nepeese had built a shelter of balsams behind the big rock, and on a small white plot of sand Pierrot was kneeling over a fire preparing breakfast while the Willow arranged her hair. He raised his head to speak to her, and saw Baree. In that instant the spell was broken. Baree saw the man-beast as he rose to his feet. Like a shot he was gone.

Scarcely swifter was he than Nepeese.

"Depechez vous, mon pere!" she cried. "It is the dog-pup! Quick—"

In the floating cloud of her hair she sped after Baree like the wind. Pierrot followed, and in going he caught up his rifle. It was difficult for him to catch up with the Willow. She was like a wild spirit, her little moccasined feet scarcely touching the sand as she ran up the long bar. It was wonderful to see the lithe swiftness of her, and that wonderful hair streaming out in the sun. Even now, in this moment's excitement, it made Pierrot think of McTaggart, the Hudson Bay company's factor over at Lac Bain, and what he had said yesterday. Half the night Pierrot had lain awake, gritting his teeth at thought of it; and this morning, before Baree ran upon them, he had looked at Nepeese more closely than ever before in his life. She was beautiful. She was lovelier—even than Wyola, her princess mother, who was dead. That hair—which made men stare as if they could not believe! Those eyes—like pools filled with wonderful starlight! Her slimness, that was like a flower! And McTaggart had said—

Floating back to him there came an excited cry.

"Hurry, Nootawe! He has turned into the blind canyon. He cannot escape us now."

She was panting when he came up to her. The French blood in her glowed a vivid crimson in her cheeks and lips. Her white teeth gleamed like milk.

"In there!" And she pointed.

They went in.

Ahead of them Baree was running for his life. He sensed instinctively the fact that these wonderful two-legged beings he had looked upon were all-powerful. And they were after him! He could hear them. Nepeese was following almost as swiftly as he could run. Suddenly he turned into a cleft between two great rocks. Twenty feet in, his way was barred, and he ran back. When he darted out, straight up the canyon, Nepeese was not a dozen yards behind him, and he saw Pierrot almost at her side. The Willow gave a cry.

"Mana—mana—there he is!"

She caught her breath, and darted into a copse of young balsams where Baree had disappeared. Like a great entangling web her loose hair impeded her in the brush, and with an encouraging cry to Pierrot she stopped to gather it over her shoulder as he ran past her. She lost only a moment or two, and was after him. Fifty yards ahead of her Pierrot gave a warning shout. Baree had turned. Almost in the same breath he was tearing over his back trail, directly toward the Willow. He did not see her in time to stop or swerve aside, and Nepeese flung herself down in his path. For an instant or two they were together. Baree felt the smother of her hair, and the clutch of her hands. Then he squirmed away and darted again toward the blind end of the canyon.

Nepeese sprang to her feet. She was panting—and laughing. Pierrot came back wildly, and the Willow pointed beyond him.

"I had him—and he didn't bite!" she said, breathing swiftly. She still pointed to the end of the canyon, and she said again: "I had him—and he didn't bite me, Nootawe!"

That was the wonder of it. She had been reckless—and Baree had not bitten her! It was then, with her eyes shining at Pierrot, and the smile fading slowly from her lips, that she spoke softly the word "Baree," which in her tongue meant "the wild dog"—a little brother of the wolf.

"Come," cried Pierrot, "or we will lose him!"

Pierrot was confident. The canyon had narrowed. Baree could not get past them unseen. Three minutes later Baree came to the blind end of the canyon—a wall of rock that rose straight up like the curve of a dish. Feasting on fish and long hours of sleep had fattened him, and he was half winded as he sought vainly for an exit. He was at the far end of the dishlike curve of rock, without a bush or a clump of grass to hide him, when Pierrot and Nepeese saw him again. Nepeese made straight toward him. Pierrot, foreseeing what Baree would do, hurried to the left, at right angles to the end of the canyon.

In and out among the rocks Baree sought swiftly for a way of escape. In a moment more he had come to the "box," or cup of the canyon. This was a break in the wall, fifty or sixty feet wide, which opened into a natural prison about an acre in extent. It was a beautiful spot. On all sides but that leading into the coulee it was shut in by walls of rock. At the far end a waterfall broke down in a series of rippling cascades. The grass was thick underfoot and strewn with flowers. In this trap Pierrot had got more than one fine haunch of venison. From it there was no escape, except in the face of his rifle. He called to Nepeese as he saw Baree entering it, and together they climbed the slope.

Baree had almost reached the edge of the little prison meadow when suddenly he stopped himself so quickly that he fell back on his haunches, and his heart jumped up into his throat.

For perhaps a half-minute Baree hesitated between the two perils. He heard the voices of Nepeese and Pierrot. He caught the rattle of stones under their feet. And he was filled with a great dread. Then he looked at Wakayoo. The big bear had not moved an inch. He, too, was listening. But to him there was a thing more disturbing than the sounds he heard. It was the scent which he caught in the air—the man-scent.

Baree, watching him, saw his head swing slowly even as the footsteps of Nepeese and Pierrot became more and more distinct. It was the first time Baree had ever stood face to face with the big bear. He had watched him fish; he had fattened on Wakayoo's prowess; he had held him in splendid awe. Now there was something about the bear that took away his fear and gave him in its place a new and thrilling confidence. Wakayoo, big and powerful as he was, would not run from the two-legged creatures who pursued him! If Baree could only get past Wakayoo he was safe!

Baree has lots of trouble without the aid of his parents. What next?

Cold Welcome Given to Cargo of Bananas

John S. Mackintosh, who died in Washington recently, was for almost fifty years an exporter in Boston, operating a line of clipper ships. With every ship came some curiosity. One day a ship returned from Central America, and the master showed Mackintosh an elongated yellow fruit that grew in clusters.

Mackintosh regarded it warily; the ship was half-full of such cargo, and his Scotch prudence was aroused. Even after he had eaten one and pronounced it delicious, he was not certain they could be sold.

"What do you call them?" he inquired of the skipper.

"The natives call them bananas," the sailor answered

Mackintosh put them up for sale, and a few curiosity seekers bought a bunch or so. He harangued their quality and tried to impress upon the Bostonians the deliciousness of the fruit. But his venture failed.

Caves of Elephanta

Not far from Bombay, India, are the famous caves of Elephanta. Elephanta is an island long held as a sacred place by Orientals. The name was given by the Portuguese from a colossal sculpture of an elephant. A series of subterranean temples are hewn right out of the solid rock. Columns of the natural rock are left standing to support the roof, says the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

MIDDLE AGE BRINGS NEW INTERESTS

For Women in Good Health

MRS. HARVEY TUCKER
408 WALKER STREET, SHELBYVILLE, IND.

"Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be"

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grandchildren, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

Thousands of women of middle age, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Those who have learned through their own experience the merit of this dependable medicine are enthusiastic in recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

"I had been in bad condition for three months. I could not do my work. One day I read what your medicine had done and just had a feeling that it would help me, so I sent and got a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I had only taken half a bottle when I got up and started to do my work. It gave me an appetite, and helped me wonderfully. I can not praise this medicine highly enough. I surely will advise all women and girls to take it, and they don't have to use rouge to look healthy. My two daughters are taking it now and one is also using the Sanative Wash. I am willing to have you use this testimonial and I will answer letters from women asking about the medicine."—MRS. HARVEY TUCKER, 408 Walker St., Shelbyville, Indiana.

"I read about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the little books you give away and began to take the medicine. After the first few bottles I began to feel better and could eat better and had fewer headaches. I feel like a different person. At anytime that I don't feel good I take the Vegetable Compound again, as I always keep a bottle on hand. You may use this letter for every word is true. I will answer any letters sent to me."—MRS. JENNIE BOLLERMAN, 516 Smith St., West Hoboken, N. J.

Slightly Twisted

Ralph Heilman, dean of the school of commerce of Northwestern university, says he has discovered the best tongue twister. He credits it to an office assistant. Recently, he relates, the young women was bewildered by a crowd of people waiting to see the dean at a time when he was busy with some important work. Determined to spare him, she faced the waiting group and announced:

"I'm sorry, but I can make no appointments. The bean is dizzy."

How He "Did" Them

"What's up wi' ye, Tom?" asked several members of the company.

Tom pulled his face straight. "Well," he said, "I've been fairly bothered lately wi' them insurance chaps about insuring my housekeeper, but I've done 'em now."

"What hast done?" eagerly inquired the company.

Kept Record Straight

The record in school attendance for Monmouthshire, England, has been created by Cora Price, fifteen-year-old daughter of a Varteg miner, who has not been late or absent once in ten years, says the London Mail.

From her home at the top of a mountain, the girl struggled through the snowstorms which occurred shortly before Christmas, in order that her record might not be spoiled.

BEET FIELD ADJOINING SITE OF FACTORY AT EAST GRAND FORKS.

PROGRESS MADE IN BEET GROWING

New $1,500,000 Sugar Factory Planned This Year for East Grand Forks.

By E. C. LEEDY

The construction this year of a $1,500,000 Sugar factory at East Grand Forks by the American Beet Sugar Company sets a new mile post marking the progress of agriculture in the Red River Valley.

The Red River Valley has long been recognized as one of the most fertile soil regions of the United States. The country now is growing in increasing acreage crops such as corn, alfalfa and sweet clover. These crops are recognized as among the best for soil improvement. They support livestock which provides the means for enriching the soil in larger quantity and at lower cost than by any other means.

When sugar beets are grown in rotation with these feed crops and grain to promote deep cultivation and insure cleaning the land of foul growth farmers have the best combination to increase the productiveness of the land.

Guaranteed Market, Minimum Price.

A very important factor in sugar beet growing is the method of marketing the crop. The sugar company contracts to buy all the beets the farmer delivers at a minimum price. The price guarantees the cost of production on a good average yield plus a fair profit. Yields of ten to twelve tons to the acre are secured by careful methods and under average conditions.

There is no danger of over production in sugar beets, first, because the factory contracts only for the amount they are prepared to manufacture and second because the United States imports four-fifths of the sugar consumed. Last year we consumed 5,500,000 tons and produced about 800,000 tons from beets and less than 200,000 tons from cane—a total of 1,000,000 tons.

Following are acreage yields and net profits secured last year by several important Valley growers:

	Acres	Tons	Net profit per acre.
August Balzum	25.73	10.48	$29.57
Arthur A. Ross	49.78	12.86	37.56
Halstad Nygaard	24.06	12.91	65.42
Edw. H. Reitmeier	18.63	11.2	29.67
Arneson Bros.	18.13	11.42	31.32
W. A. Jarvis	46.79	11.77	34.50
Chas Hertweck	29.14	12.87	41.23

These profits were secured with sugar selling at a normally low prices and at the guaranteed minimum price. If sugar sold at prices that prevailed for several years prior to 1925 the profit should have been much larger.

Indirect Benefits from Beet Growing

The tops from an acre of beets are said by most growers to be equal in value to a ton of hay—$5 to $10 an acre. Pulp and syrup from the factory are excellent and cheap feed for livestock. The ground after digging the beets is left plowed deep and in good condition for planting to other crops early in the spring: if the beets have been carefully tended foul weeds have been destroyed: if well manured the extra labor will be well repaid in beet yield and the soil left in the very best condition for two or three years. Very large yields of oats, barley and wheat have been reported after sugar beets. It is difficult to estimate the value in succeeding crops but yields are often increased 25% to 50%.

Will Promote Small Farms.

A well balanced farming system based upon sugar beets, alfalfa, sweet clover, corn and small grain includes dairy and beef cattle, hogs, sheep and poultry in order to profitably consume the feed and forage crops. This will promote small farms, well manned, on which there is employment at all seasons of the year for all hands. Through maximum man-power employment and a system that ever increases productiveness land values are certain to increase.

When we can show overwhelming evidence of profitable farming it is not going to be very difficult to find new settlers who will want to locate in the country to invest in farm homes. Sugar beet growing will attract industrious farmers who are not concerned so much with the amount of labor it requires to grow crops by how much profit they are going to get out of their work and how certain they can be that the land will produce in volume and with regularity to enable them to pay for the land.

Germany long ago determined to develop sugar beet growing even tho a large part of the sugar must be exported and cereals imported in order to build and maintain soil fertility. Germany holds worlds records for per acre yields of several cereals due mainly to sugar beet growing and livestock.

The Great Northern Railway has just published for free distribution a profusely illustrated folder on sugar beet growing in the Red River Valley.

RAILROAD OPENS NEW TERRITORY

Town Springs Up On Wheat Field and Greets Arrival of Trains.

Scobey, Mont.—On the prairie of upper eastern Montana from which region wheat used to be hauled 60 miles in wagons to market now stands the new town of Peerless, the present terminus of the Scobey-Opheim extension of the Great Northern Ry. Thirty-five miles remain to be built and the extension will be completed this year, incidentally opening for settlement about half a million acres of virgin Montana state land.

The railway reached this new frontier town November 16th, and 150 cars of wheat have been shipped out of Peerless alone since the first train came.

Eight hundred farmers chipped in $325,000 with the Great Northern Railway, to build this 50 miles of railway extension and a new empire about twice the size of the state of Rhode Island is being opened in Montana by this project. This line which is extended west from Scobey, Mont., paralleling the Canadian boundary, is to cost about $1,250,000. The farmers and a few business men purchased $325,000 of Great Northern treasury stock at par and the Hill line is furnishing the balance of the money needed to build the line.

This is the first time in the history of the Northwest that farmers have assisted in financing an extension line. These farmers have been hauling their grain to market in wagons and motor trucks, some of them being obliged to travel 60 miles to sell their products. Five new towns are being established in this new domain and each of these towns will draw grain, live stock and other farm products from about 15 townships, representing areas that equal the size of the average Minnesota or Iowa counties.

Considerable area in Canada also will be served by this railway extension. When the road is completed this year, it is estimated an additional million and a half bushels of wheat will be marketed from this section. Most of the wheat raised in this upper region of Montana is eagerly sought by Eastern millers because of its unusually high protein content, and it is sold on the market at a premium of 15c or more per bushel above ordinary wheat.

The new empire which the extension of this line will open is one of the most desirable wheat regions on the North American continent under the summer fallow system of agriculture. There are 1,500,000 virgin acres that will be cultivated to support this new railway extension.

The schools of the Holt section will hold a declamatory contest on Saturday April 24th, at eight p. m. at the Pioneer School.

WORK IS STARTED ON 8 MILE TUNNEL IN THE CASCADES

Famous Scenic Resort Turned Into "Gang House" for Workmen On Great Northern's $8,000,000 Project.

Scenic, Washington—Scenic Hot Springs, famous hotel health resort in the Cascade Mountains of Washington has been transformed into a camp for the army of working men now engaged in "cutting" an 8-mile tunnel through the mountains to shorten the Great Northern Railway's transcontinental line by 17 miles.

This will be the longest tunnel in North America and one of the longest in the world. It will cost $8,000,000 according to the estimates of Ralph Budd, president of the Great Northern Railway, who is, himself, a construction engineer of national repute. Mr. Budd says it will be comparable to the great Loetschberg tunnel through the Alps in Oberland, Switzerland, 9¼ miles long, which was opened in 1913 and which cost $10,000,000.

The tunnel will pierce the Cascades at Berne, in Chelan county, and extend to near Scenic, in King county. It will replace the present stretch of track of 17 miles, which includes the road's present Cascade tunnel 2⅝ miles in length. It will run on a straight track with a one and one-half per cent grade and will save one hour's running time and is expected to be completed within three years.

The tunnel-building program is a part of the project for developing 75,000 horsepower through a dam to be erected at the southern end of Lake Chelan. This hydro-electric development will provide current for operation of Great Northern trains through the new tunnel and also will make possible the irrigation of approximately 80,000 acres of land in the Chelan region.

The project is expected to save the railroad $500,000 a year, in comparison to the cost of hauling trains over the present steeper grades and maintaining snow protection.

> NARROW ESCAPE
>
> Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more. He strays into the trapping grounds of Pierrot and Nepeese. Nepeese wounds Baree with a rifle, but he escapes. Baree recovers and learns nature's secrets rapidly. Nepeese is determined to catch Baree and tame him and tries again.

Baree darted to one side and ran for the open meadow. Wakayoo did not stir as Baree sped past him—no more than if he had been a bird or a rabbit. Then came another breath of air, heavy with the scent of man. This, at last, put life into him. He turned and began lumbering after Baree into the meadow trap. Baree, looking back, saw him coming—and thought it was pursuit. Nepeese and Pierrot came over the slope, and at the same instant they saw Wakayoo and Baree.

When they entered into the grassy dip under the rock walls, Baree turned sharply to the right. Here was a great boulder, one end of it tilted up off the earth. It looked like a splendid hiding place, and Baree crawled under it.

From where he lay Baree could see what happened. Scarcely had he crawled under the rock when Nepeese and Pierrot appeared through the break in the dip, and stopped. The fact that they stopped thrilled Baree. They were afraid of Wakayoo! The big bear was two-thirds of the way across the meadow. The sun fell on him, so his coat shone like black satin. Pierrot did not kill for the love of killing. Necessity made him a conservationist. But he saw that in spite of the lateness of the season, Wakayoo's coat was splendid—and he raised his rifle.

Baree saw this action. He saw, a moment later, something spit from the end of the gun, and then he heard that deafening crash that had come with his own hurt, when the Willow's bullet had burned through his flesh. He turned his eyes swiftly to Wakayoo. The big bear had stumbled; he was on his knees; and then he struggled up and lumbered on.

The roar of the rifle came again, and a second time Wakayoo went down. Pierrot could not miss at that distance. Wakayoo made a splenddi mark. It was slaughter; yet for Pierrot and Nepeese it was business—the business of life.

Baree was shivering. It was more from excitement than fear, for he had lost his own fear in the tragedy of these moments. A low whine rose in his throat as he looked at Wakayoo, who had risen again and faced his enemies—his jaws gaping, his head swinging slowly, his legs weakening under him as the blood poured through his torn lungs. Baree whined—because Wakayoo had fished for him, because he had come to look on him as a friend, and because he knew it was death that Wakayoo was facing now. There was a third shot—the last. Wakayoo sank down in his tracks. His big head dropped between his forepaws. A racking cough or two came to Baree. And then there was silence.

It was slaughter—but business.

A minute later, standing over Wakayoo, Pierrot said to Nepeese:

"Mon Dieu, but it is a fine skin, Sakahet! It is worth twenty dollars over at Lac Bain!"

He drew forth his knife and began whetting it on a stone which he carried in his pocket. In these minutes Baree might have crawled out from under his rock and escaped down the canyon; for a space he was forgotten. Then Nepeese thought of him, and in that same strange, wondering voice she spoke again the word "Baree."

"Oui, Sakahet. He was born of the wild. And now he is gone—"

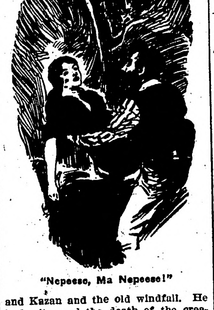
The Willow shook her head.

"Non, he is not gone," she said, and her dark eyes quested the sunlit meadow.

As she quested the ragged edges of the little meadow for signs of the dog-pup, her thoughts flashed back swiftly. Two years ago they had buried her princess mother under the tall spruce [illegible]. That day Pierrot's sun had set for all time, and her own life was filled with a vast loneliness. There had been three at the graveside that afternoon as the sun went down—Pierrot, herself, and a dog, a great, powerful husky with a white star on his breast and a white-tipped ear. He had been her dead mother's pet from puppyhood—her bodyguard, with her always, even with his head resting on the side of her bed as she died. And that night, the night of the day they buried her, the dog had disappeared. He had gone as quietly and as completely as her spirit. No one ever saw him after that. It was strange, and to Pierrot it was a miracle. Deep in his heart he was filled with the wonderful conviction that the dog had gone with his beloved Wyola into heaven.

But Nepeese had spent three winters at the Missioner's school at Nelson house. She had learned a great deal about white people and the real God, and she knew that Pierrot's thought was impossible. She believed that her mother's husky was either dead or had joined the wolves. Probably he had gone to the wolves. So—was it not possible that this youngster she and her father had pursued was of the flesh and blood of her mother's pet? It was more than possible. The white star on his breast, the white-tipped ear—the fact that he had not bitten her when he might easily have buried his fangs in the soft flesh of her arms! She was convinced. While Pierrot skinned the bear, she began hunting for Baree.

Baree had not moved an inch from under his rock. He lay like a thing stunned, his eyes fixed steadily on the scene of the tragedy out in the meadow. He had seen something that he would never forget—even as he would never quite forget his mother and Kazan and the old windfall. He had witnessed the death of the creature he had thought all-powerful. Wakayoo, the big bear, had not even put up a fight. Pierrot and Nepeese had killed him without touching him; now Pierrot was cutting him with a knife which shot silvery flashes in the sun; and Wakayoo made no movement. It made Baree shiver, and he drew himself an inch farther back under the rock, where he was already wedged as if he had been shoved there by a strong hand.



"Nepeese, Ma Nepeese!"

He could see Nepeese. She came straight back to the break through which his flight had taken him, and stood at last not more than twenty feet from where he was hidden. Now that she stood where he could not escape, she began weaving her shining hair into two thick braids. Baree had taken his eyes from Pierrot, and he watched her curiously. He was not afraid now. His nerves tingled. In him a strange and growing force was struggling to solve a great mystery—the reason for his desire to creep out from under his rock and approach that wonderful creature with the shining eyes and the beautiful hair. Nepeese was looking about her. She was smiling. For a moment her face was turned toward him, and he saw the white shine of her teeth, and her beautiful eyes seemed glowing straight at him.

And then, suddenly, she dropped on her knees and peered under the rock.

Their eyes met. For at least half a minute there was not a sound. Nepeese did not move, and her breath came so softly that Baree could not hear it.

Then she said, almost in a whisper:

"Baree! Baree! Up! Baree!"

It was the first time Baree had heard his name, and there was something so soft and assuring in the sound of it that in spite of himself the dog in him responded to it in a whimper that just reached the Willow's ears. Slowly she stretched in an arm. It was bare and round and soft. He might have darted forward the length of his body and buried his fangs in it easily. But something held him back. He knew that it was not an enemy; he know that the dark eyes shining at him so wonderfully were not filled with the desire to harm—and the voice that came to him softly was like a strange and thrilling music.

"Baree! Baree! Up! Baree!"

Over and over again the Willow called to him like that, while on her face she tried to draw herself a few inches farther under the rock. She could not reach him. There was still a foot between her hand and Baree, and she could not wedge herself in an inch more. And then she saw where on the other side of the rock there was a hollow, shut in by a stone. If she had removed the stone, and come in that way—

She drew herself out and stood once more in the sunshine. Her heart thrilled. Pierrot was busy over his bear—and she would not call him. She made an effort to move the stone which closed in the hollow under the big bowlder, but it was wedged in tightly. Then she began digging with a stick. If Pierrot had been there, his sharp eyes would have discovered the significance of that stone, which was not larger than a water pail. Possibly for centuries it had lain there, its support keeping the huge rock from toppling down, just as an ounce-weight may swing the balance of a wheel that weighs a ton.

Five minutes—and Nepeese could move the stone. She tugged at it. Inch by inch she dragged it out until at last it lay at her feet and the opening was ready for her body. She looked again toward Pierrot. He was still busy, and she laughed softly as she untied a big red-and-white Bay handkerchief from about her shoulders. With this she would secure Baree. She dropped on her hands and knees and then lowered herself flat on the ground and began crawling into the hollow under the bowlder.

Baree had moved. With the back of his head flattened against the rock, he had heard something which Nepeese had not heard; he had felt a slow and growing pressure, and from this pressure he had dragged himself slowly—and the pressure still followed. The mass of rock was settling! Nepeese did not see or hear or understand. She was calling to him more and more pleadingly:

"Baree—Baree—Baree—"

Her head and shoulders and both arms were under the rock now. The glow of her eyes was very close to Baree. He whined. The thrill of a great and impending danger stirred in his blood. And then—

In that moment Nepeese felt the pressure of the rock on her shoulder, and into the eyes that had been glowing softly at Baree there shot a sudden wild look of horror. And then there came from her lips a cry that was not like any other sound Baree had ever heard in the wilderness—wild, piercing, filled with agonized fear. Pierrot did not hear that first cry. But he heard the second and the third—and then scream after scream as the Willow's tender body was slowly crushed under the settling mass. He ran toward it with the speed of the wind. The cries were weaker—dying away. He saw Baree as he came out from under the rock and ran into the canyon, and in the same instant he saw a part of the Willow's dress and her moccasined feet. The rest of her was hidden under the death-trap. Like a madman Pierrot began digging. When a few moments later he drew Nepeese out from under the bowlder she was white and deathly still. Her eyes were closed. His hand could not feel that she was living, and a great moan of anguish rose out of his soul. But he knew how to fight for a life. He tore open her dress and found that she was not crushed as he had feared. Then he ran for water. When he returned, the Willow's eyes were open and she was gasping for breath.

She smiled at him, with her two hands on her bare breast, and Pierrot hugged her up to him, forgetting the water he had run so hard to get.

Still later, when he got down on his knees and peered under the rock, his face turned white and he said:

"Mon Dieu, if it had not been for that little hollow in the earth, Nepeese—"

He shuddered, and said no more. But Nepeese, happy in her salvation, made a movement with her hand and said, smiling at him:

"I would have been like—that. Ah, mon pere, I hope I shall never have a lover like that rock!"

Pierrot's face darkened as he bent over her.

"Non!" he said fiercely. "Never!"

He was thinking again of McTaggart, the factor at Lac Bain, and his hands clenched while his lips softly touched the Willow's hair.

> Will Baree finally come under the domination of Nepeese?

Finns' Double Christmas

For centuries before the year 1772 the people of Finland had four Christmas holidays, but a Swedish royal decree issued that year abolished the third and fourth, as it was thought desirable to curtail the festival in the interest of work. But the Finns still have two Christmas holidays, December 25 and 26 (St. Stephen's day).

Muffler Changes Gas

One of the most serious perils of the automobile, carbon-monoxide gas, is reported to have been eliminated in a special muffler devised by a Paris engineer, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. It not only does away with all traces of smoke but destroys the poisonous gas by transforming it into harmless carbon dioxide. This is done by a heating element in the muffler which completes the combustion of the vapor.

Strength of Hyena's Jaws

The hyena is one of the strongest of mammals, but it is known also as one of the most cowardly. A small dog has been known to send one flying. Only when cornered will it fight. Its jaws are strong enough to crush the shinbone of a horse. In Asia and Africa, where it is most commonly found, the animal is held in contempt because of its skulking habits.

Under present arrangements 17 camp periods will be conducted with members of the Organized Reserve corps, Minnesota National guard, Reserve Officers Training corps and citizens taking part.

Crookston—Five hundred young men gathered at a monster meeting here and organized the first unit of the "Stay West Young Man" club. From Fisher, Mentor, Fertile and Red Lake Falls three young men of the west drove in to change Horace Greeley's admonition of old to "stay west, young men."

St. Paul—Citizens of Minnesota are called upon to lend their financial and moral support to the advertising and publicity campaign being launched by the Ten Thousand Lakes association, heralding to the nation the advantages of Minnesota, in a proclamation issued by Governor Christianson, designating the week of May 3 as "Ten Thousand Lakes week."

Morris—A golf association has been organized with B. J. Benfield of Morris as president. The plan calls for each of six clubs to hold a tournament every other Sunday. The clubs in the association are Pomme de Terre, Graceville, Appleton, Ortonville, Beardsley, Browns Valley and Millbank. When the regular schedule is concluded the season will close in a tournament at Millbank.

Minneapolis — Magnus Martinson, publisher of the magazine, "Scandal," was found guilty of criminal libel by a jury in Hennepin county district court. The charge against Martinson followed publication of a report that former United States Senator Magnus Johnson had been arrested for drunkenness. A. N. Jacobs, editor of the publication, was convicted in district court on the same charge and is at present serving a sentence of 90 days in the workhouse.

Minneapolis—Thirty creamery buildings, the majority owned and operated by farmers co-operatively, are rising throughout Minnesota this spring in a $700,000 creamery construction program, to be followed by an increase in butter production of approximately 10,000,000 pounds.

Rochester—Last summer tourists brought Minnesota $59,000,000 in extra income, conservatively estimated, H. C. Hotaling, secretary of the Ten Thousand Lakes association, declared at a meeting of the Rochester Commercial club. He gave a general discussion of the value of tourist travel.

TWO HOMES MADE HAPPY

By Women Who Used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I think it is the most wonderful medicine I ever tried," is the statement made by Mrs. Goldie Shoup of May View, Illinois. She declares that after taking the Compound she is in better health than before.

Mrs. J. Storms of 29 Lane Street, Paterson, N. J., writes: "I can not speak too highly of your medicine and I recommend it to all my friends."

These statements were taken from two enthusiastic letters which tell of the help that has been received from using the Vegetable Compound. Both Mrs. Shoup and Mrs. Storms were in a run-down condition which caused them much unhappiness. When women are suffering from lack of strength and from weakness, their own life and that of their family is affected. When they feel well and strong and are able to do their housework easily, happy homes are the result.

Thousands of testimonial letters have been received from women in different walks of life, stating that the Compound has helped them.

Dull Time

With his advancement to a directorship, Jimmy Wilkinson of F. O. B. suddenly developed a taste for antiques and began ransacking the Hollywood prop shops for the usual line of junk. One day he took one of the children with him and put in several hours in musty basements, revelling in the cobweb-covered furniture that grows more and more expensive as the years roll by.

Finally the little one, who got no kick at all out of this form of shopping, tugged at Jimmy's coat sleeve and whispered:

"Daddy, please let's not buy any more of that elderly furniture."

CREAM SOUPS

As cream soups are sufficiently nourishing to be served as the main dish of a luncheon or supper, a few suggestions may be helpful. Any vegetable which has been cooked until tender, mashed or riced, may be used. One cupful of the vegetable with a binding of a tablespoonful each of flour and butter and a pint and a half of milk will, with proper seasonings, make a tasty soup.

Cream of Potato Soup.—Boil ten large potatoes and mash with one cupful of cream, season to taste with salt and grated onion. Blend a tablespoonful of flour with two tablespoonfuls of butter and add two cupfuls of cold milk; cook until smooth. Add four cupfuls of boiling veal stock, the mashed potatoes, and bring to the boiling paint. This recipe may be divided for a small family.

Egg Soup.—Butter six slices of bread, sprinkle with sugar and brown in the oven. Reheat two cupfuls of veal stock and two cupfuls of milk, with the yolks of three eggs, using care not to cook until the egg curdles. Add a tablespoonful of butter; season with salt, pepper, minced parsley and a grating of nutmeg. Pour over the toast; cover for ten minutes and serve.

Veal and Celery Soup.—Cut up three pounds of veal, break the bones and cover with four quarts of water, bring to the simmering point and simmer for four hours. Add two bunches of celery and two chopped onions, simmer until the vegetables are soft, then press through a sieve. Thicken with two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch mixed with two cupfuls of milk, add two tablespoonfuls of butter in small bits; reheat and serve with diced fried bread.

Any leftover cooked vegetable like spinach, asparagus, peas or onions, will, when put through a sieve and added to the hot milk, binding with butter and flour, make a most acceptable soup.

We All Like Chicken.

A small amount of chicken will season a dish, making a most attractive, nourishing and economical main dish. With two cupfuls each of chicken and rice, and one cupful of chicken gravy, a bit of onion, served hot from a baking dish, you have a tasty luncheon.

Chicken Loaf.—Chop the meat from one chicken, add one cupful of cooked rice, one egg, one-half cupful of chopped celery, one-fourth of a cupful of milk, one-half cupful of nut meats, one small onion chopped and season to taste with salt and pepper. Roll in a long loaf and bake.

Chicken Pie.—Take two cupfuls of bits of chicken left from a roasted fowl, add any gravy left, a stalk of celery chopped, one small onion chopped, rich milk to make sufficient moisture, season well and cover with baking powder biscuits. Bake until brown. Have the chicken boiling hot before the biscuits are placed. Serve piping hot.

Escalloped Chicken.—Place layers of cooked chicken in the bottom of buttered baking pan, then add a layer of cooked rice, hominy or bread crumbs; repeat until all is used. Sprinkle with cornmeal which has been mixed with pepper and salt and pour over a cupful of white sauce. Use another cupful of white sauce between the layers. Bake until hot and serve.

Creole Chicken.—Take two cupfuls of chopped chicken, one chopped onion, one green pepper chopped, two cupfuls of cooked tomato and one tablespoonful of butter. Cook the onion and pepper in the butter, add the other ingredients and serve poured over hot-cooked rice or hominy.

Sweetbread Soup.—Reheat one quart of veal stock and add two cupfuls of cream which has been beaten with the yolks of two eggs. Take from the fire, season to taste, add one cupful of parboiled sweetbreads cut into bits. Garnish with one cupful of whipped cream and a bit of parsley.

Meat Pates.—Scrape with a small, sharp-edged spoon, a piece of the round of beef. This removes the tender meat fibers, leaving the connecting tissue, which is hard to digest. Press the scraped meat into a small cake and broil over coals or in a very hot pan, until brown on both sides. Season before serving and serve on toast.

Scallop of Ham and Noodles.—Cook the noodles in beef stock and put them in layers with cold cooked ham that has been put through the meat grinder, adding a little soup stock for moisture. Bake until hot.

For the dinner, a clear soup, if followed by a heavy dinner; if not a cream soup is appropriate; one vegetable besides the potato, a roast, a simple dessert with coffee.

Recalling Early Days of American Currency

An innocent dog played his part in the creation of our oldest American bank, says Girard in the Philadelphia Inquirer. When Continental money was not worth a "Continental d—n," Philadelphia staged a financial frolic. A big dog was covered with tar and then plastered over with Continental dollar bills. With drum and fife and flying flags that dog was marched down Chestnut street and around the center of the city by a shouting gang of men and boys. Five days later came Robert Morris' plan for a permanent bank to replace the old Pennsylvania bank, which had done its work and was soon to quit.

Less honor is given to that temporary bank than its record merits. One thing it did was to buy 3,000,000 rations for Washington's soldiers. Another, possibly less worthy object, was the purchase for them of 300 barrels of rum.

His Notion

"A perfesser says, here in the paper," remarked Mrs. Johnson, in the midst of her reading, "that a man shouldn't change his business after he is forty-five."

"Aw, I d'know about that," returned Gap Johnson of Rumpus Ridge. "Fashions in bootlegging change, and it 'pears like a feller ort to change with 'em."—Kansas City Star.

The water-strider, a common aquatic insect, does not swim, but actually stands and runs on the surface of the water.

Sick bodies made strong

"Had stomach trouble more or less for forty years. Lately it became acute . . . like a knife going through me. Went days without food, nights without sleep. Tanlac cured me completely. I'm 84, gained 25 lbs., feel fine." Chas. F. Sherman, 520 First Ave., Eau Claire, Wis.

After a spell of Grippe or flu, when your system is all run down and your legs are so weak they can hardly hold up your body, start right in taking Tanlac.

It's wonderful how soon you really do improve! Tanlac sails right in and puts the system in fighting trim. It cleans the blood, revitalizes the digestive organs, gives you an appetite for solid food and makes you feel like a new person.

Nothing will turn the trick quite as fast as Tanlac, made after the famous Tanlac formula from roots, barks and herbs. Buy a bottle today and get started back to full strength and vigor. Take Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation.

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgagee hereinafter named are authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and payable and they hereby do declare said sum due and payable, which mortgage was executed by Sophie Jefferson and Christ Jefferson, her husband, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated November 15th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minneosta, on the 20th day of November, A. D. 1920, at 8 o'clock A. M., in Book 104 of Mortgages, on page 31,

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, joint owners, payable to either or survivor, by written assignment, dated December 17th, A. D. 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, A. D. 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 455;

And whereas, the said Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, the assignees and holders of said mortgage have duly elected and do hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2,000.00), with accumulated interest from the 15th day of November, 1923, at the rate of six and one-half per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof;

NOW THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz:

Lots Six, Seven, Ten and Eleven (6, 7, 10 & 11), of Section Three (3), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty-two (42) West of the P. M., containing one hundred sixty-two and 48-100 acres, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota.

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the Front door of the County Court House, at Warren, in said County and State on the 1st day of June, 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Seventy-five Dollars attorneys fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of Foreclosure.

Dated April 12th, 1926.

VETERINARIANS PLAN MEETING AT CROOKSTON

District Conference to Consider Poultry Diseases Will Be Led By Dr. W. A. Billings

All veterinarians in Polk, Red Lake, Pennington, Marshall, Kittson, Norman, Mahnomen and Clay counties are being invited to attend a district conference at Crookston on Friday, May 7, for the purpose of studying problems of poultry disease control.

Dr. W. A. Billings, veterinary specialist with the agricultural extention service of the university, will lead the discussions. Dr. H. Eedin and Dr. H. Langevin, both of Crookston, are in charge of local arrangements. The conference will begin at 10 a. m. and continue until 4 p. m., with dinner or banquet session.

Dr. Billings will hold twelve of these conferences, which are for veterinarians only, at leading points over the state. Veterinarians of practically every part of the state will have opportunity to discuss informally the newer methods of poultry sanitation and hygiene, and to consider the best methods of combating poultry diseases in their various communities.

LOUIS BENSHOOF CALLED IN TOWN

Detroit Editor Is Candidate For Republican Nomination For Representative to Cogress.

Louis Benshoof, editor of the Detroit [Minn.] Record, candidate for the Republican nomination for representative in Congress from this district, called at the NEWS office Friday morning on his way to Warroad.

For the past fifteen year he has been an outstanding advocate of conservation of natural resources in northern Minnesota, and has attracted considerable attention all over the state with his popular lecture, "The Big Outdoors".

He has a strong and forceful personality, a reputation for doing well the things he starts out to do, and if successful in his candidacy this year would make a creditable representative from Minnesota in the halls of the National Congress——and a man who could be depended upon to stand squarely behind the state and the nation in his support of things most desirable.

DEATH CALLS MRS. E. T. EIDE

Former Holt Girl Dies at Spooner.

The entire community here was saddened last Friday morning to hear of the death of Mrs. E. T. Eide of Spooner, Minn., which occured last Thursday evening.

Several weeks ago she was taken ill with kidney trouble and an operation was found necessary. She withstood it and was getting along nicely when she was seized with mumps. Then pneumonia set in and her condition became hopeless. In spite of everything that the best medical aid could do she gradually sank, and her soul went to its eternal reward.

Funeral services were held at on Sunday afternoon and the body was brought here to her childhood home for interment on Tuesday.

Mrs. Eide, whose maiden name was Anna Holl, went to Spooner in 1914 as the bride of Mr. Eide, and during the twelve years that she lived the she endeared herself to everybody who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. She reared a family of six children, and she lavished on them all the love and care that a good mother could. The children are Lillian 11, Florence 9, Irene 7, Eddie 5, John 3 and Mabel 19 months.

Mrs. Eide was born at Holt 34 years ago, and besides her husband and children she is survived by her parents and five brothers. Her five sisters add one brother had already passed away. Her mother has been very ill and was unable to be with her during her illness.

Mrs. Eide was a good neighbor, a good mother and a good wife, and the genuine, whole-souled sympathy of the entire community goes out to Mr. Eide and the motherless children in the great loss they have been called upon to bear.

Mother's Cook Book

When happiness can be manufactured so cheaply and sell so high, and is always wanted in the market, it seems a pity that more of us do not set up in the business.—W. C. Gannet.

EASY DESSERTS

THE dessert adds the finishing touch to a good meal. It should be appropriate to the meal it follows. If a light meal, then a heartier dessert may follow, like steamed pudding, apple dumplings, pie and such desserts. Following a heavy meal, dainty dishes of sweets or fruits are best liked.

Date Pudding.

Boil together ten minutes two cupfuls of water, three-fourths of a cupful of brown sugar and three tablespoonfuls of cornstarch. Add one cupful of sliced dates. Mold in sherbet cups, garnish with chopped nuts and serve with whipped cream.

Apple Snow.

Pare and cut four apples into quarters. Cover with boiling water and cook until the apples are soft and the water almost evaporated. Cool, put through a sieve, add powdered sugar to taste and fold in an equal quantity of whipped cream. Chill before serving.

Apricot Ice.

Take four cupfuls of dried apricots, four cupfuls of water, the juice of three lemons, one-half cupful of sugar and the whites of three eggs. Soak the apricots until soft, then cook until tender. Press through a potato ricer to remove skins. Add the sugar to the pulp, then the water and cook ten minutes. Remove from the heat, cool, add lemon juice and freeze. When the mixture is partly frozen, remove the cover and stir in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Cover and finish freezing.

Date Pie.

Cook one-third of a pound of dates in two cupfuls of milk twenty minutes, strain and rub through a sieve, then add two eggs, a fourth of a teaspoonful of salt, nutmeg to flavor and sugar to taste. Bake in one crust as a custard pie.

A raisin pie is a very rich and well-liked dessert. This should follow a light meal as it is a highly nourishing dessert.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT

By F. A. WALKER

MAKING OPPORTUNITY

WHATEVER may be the common belief about opportunity and its disinclination to knock more than once at your door, will, if you look into the matter, be found wholly untrue.

A plain, cut and dry explanation concerning the activities of opportunity disproves its alleged caprices and its unwillingness to be helpful to mankind, for it is ever ready to serve men and women, whether it knocks at their doors, or is attacked in the street, and made to stand and deliver by the mere force of a smile.

Alas! for the man who does not recognize opportunity when he meets it, which may be a dozen times a day while he is bemoaning his lot or lamenting his fate.

He flounders and pants through mazes of doubt and despair, when, if he would sit down a while and take stock of his surroundings, he would probably find that opportunity had been playing hide and seek with him all day, and wondering why he was so blind.

Tried as you may be by the squalls and cross-currents, opportunity is often sitting beside you waiting for a friendly nod, or a good, old-fashioned handshake.

It suspects your aspirations and knows your shortcomings. It knows, too, your inward resolution, your weakness, lack of faith and hope, and would at the slightest hint rush to your assistance.

"Well, when?" you may ask cynically.

"Right now," comes back the reply, "but you must do your part and play the man in doing it."

Stick a flower in the lapel of your threadbare coat, draw in your chin, puff out your breast, inhale the life-giving morning air and walk like a supercilious drill-master, and opportunity will give you a snappy salute.

Never drag your feet, wear a woebegone expression, nor let the crowd trample you down. Never admit defeat.

Make friends with faith and cheerfulness. Pursue this course from the moment you open your eyes in the morning, and you will find before night that opportunity has been waiting for you in places you had heretofore labeled "impossible."

Opportunity is yours whenever you may elect to accept it, notwithstanding all the time-worn sayings to the contrary.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"CRESTFALLEN"

THIS is a word popularly used in common speech to indicate dejection, to describe one in a dispirited mood. The term comes to us from the parlance of the barnyard. For while the crest which gave the word its origin is correctly the upper part of the head of any bird or animal, it is associated particularly with the comb of the cock who struts animatedly about poultry domain.

Frequenters of the barnyard know that when life goes hard with the cock his crest, which at other times protrudes proudly up into the air, is seen to fall dejectedly. This might be said, like the wagging or drooping tail on the part of the dog, to be his medium of self-expression.

The aptness of the term "crestfallen" in its figurative use for a person who is dispirited and aggrieved can hardly be questioned.

SMILE FOR SMILE

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

WE CAN'T be merry all the day, but if a friend should come your way
With smiling face and happy air,
Whatever load you have to bear,
What sort of sorrow for awhile,
I hope you give him smile for smile!

Now, much is said about the need.
Of bringing cheer to hearts that bleed
And bringing joy to souls that weep;
But there's another faith to keep,
There's something for the sad to do—
To smile at folks who smile at you!

So when they come, as come they will,
To speak of good in time of ill,
To speak of blessings, too, no doubt,
Perhaps you had forgot about,
When joy comes knocking, night or day,
Run out to meet it half the way!

Yes, there's a duty for the sad,
When good folks come to make you glad,
And that's to grin, and show your grit,
And cheer yourself a little bit.
At least this much you ought to do—
To smile at folks who smile at you.

Among the NOTABLES

LOUIS JOLLIET

TO LOUIS JOLLIET, born September 21, 1645, belongs the honor of having been the first white man to explore the upper part of the Mississippi river. Many historians claim he explored more of the river than any other man of that time, taking the honors away from both La Salle and De Soto. Beyond doubt, he was first to establish the fact that the great river did not run into the South sea, as it was believed in Canada.

Jolliet was the son of a wagon maker, better educated than most of his time, since the family had decided to make him a priest. But he turned into a fur trader and merchant, instead, and made many daring trips into unexplored wildernesses.

So great was his reputation, that he was chosen to lead the expedition that was to go down the Mississippi, Father Marquette being one of the party. Through the Illinois and Wisconsin rivers they traveled, and finally came into the Mississippi and went on to the Missouri. At this point, the Indians assured them it was but a ten days' trip to the river mouth, so they concluded the great stream ran into the Gulf of Mexico and turned back. Crossing a lake in a canoe, all Jolliet's maps were lost, and much valuable information destroyed.

His next trip was to explore the Hudson bay region and then the coast of Labrador for seal fishing. He wanted to colonize the beautiful valley of the Mississippi, but the Canadian government gave him no encouragement. He died wealthy and honored in Canada in 1700.

The Hotel Stenographer
By Roe Fulkerson

"I GOT to get on my diet again," said the hotel stenographer. "I got weighed this morning."

"Why you are not fat!" exclaimed the house detective.

"Right you are, Kelly," answered the girl, "and I am not going to be. An ounce of diet is better than a pound of adipose tissue. Fat has divorced more women than Mexico. If fat doesn't put women in the cemetery it puts them on the shelf and any woman would as soon have a nice quiet grave in a cemetery as a nice quiet place on the shelf.

"It is one thing to take off fat and look like the hand of a laundress after a hard day's washing and quite another to keep the fat off and not have the skin on your face full of little wrinkles like a punctured toy balloon. I am going to keep it off and believe thou me that if you are to be popular with the men you've got to wear a svelt figure, if you know what I mean.

"The new style dresses are made for the hipless women. If she swells in the middle like a tenpin its fare-ye-well any place except a hen party where they sip tea and knock flappers.

"Stylish stouts are for fat women who are not stylish. If keeping my eye on the calories will permit me to wear a section of fireman's hose for a dress I will watch my weight like a jockey. Prize fighters, jockeys and women have to keep inside the weight limit if they hope to get engagements.

"If spending a few cents on weighing machines and having a little sense about eating will keep me in the running I shall face the starter fit as a couple of fiddles and neither one of them will be the bass fiddle either.

"I am two pounds overweight and have cut out candy and sodas till I am back where I belong."

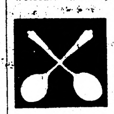
GOOD EVERYDAY FOODS

An attractive salad is always a most welcome addition to a dinner or luncheon.



Sweetbread and Cucumber Salad.—Prepare the sweetbreads by parboiling and removing all the inedible portion, then drop into cold water to make firm again: add a tablespoonful of vinegar to the water. After standing an hour, drain and cut into pieces. Cut into cubes half the amount of cucumbers, mix all together with a highly seasoned mayonnaise which has been mixed with half its bulk in whipped cream. When well blended, heap lightly into nests of tender lettuce. Serve with toasted wafers.

Celery Jelly Salad.—Put two cupfuls of strained tomatoes, a tablespoonful of grated onion, a bay leaf and a pinch of celery seed into a saucepan; bring to the boiling point and set aside for fifteen minutes to keep hot. Add half a package of gelatin which has been soaked in half a cupful of cold water, one-half teaspoonful of salt, and the juice of half a lemon. Stand over boiling water until the gelatin is dissolved; strain, stir in a quantity of finely cut tender celery and set on ice to set, stirring occasionally until it begins to thicken. Mold in small cups and chill. Serve on beds of lettuce and mask with a rich mayonnaise.

Apple Lemon Pie.—Take two cupfuls of chopped apple, one cupful of sugar, the juice and rind of a lemon, one egg well beaten, half cupful of water, and the same of cracker crumbs. Bake in a two-crust pie in a moderate oven.

Peas, Pickles, Peanuts Salad.—Take an equal quantity of peas and peanuts with enough chopped sour pickle to add zest. Serve on slices of orange, garnished with parsley. Serve with a highly seasoned boiled dressing.

Tapioca Pears.—Cook tapioca and bake with canned pears, adding grated lemon rind and butter. A little lemon juice added to the sauce which may be made from the pear juice will add to the flavor.

Mock Duck.—Take pork tenderloins and split them lengthwise. Make a dressing as for turkey. Put dressing in the meat, sew it up, season, lard with strips of salt pork, add a little hot water and bake for forty-five minutes.

Luncheon Desserts.

For the noon meal, when dinner is served at night, the dessert should be a very light one. A dish of fruit a small cake or cooky, a gelatin pudding are all desirable desserts for a light meal.

Jelly Fluff.—Take half a glass of jelly and the white of one egg; beat until stiff and the mixture will stand up alone. Heap in sherbet cups and top with a little egg white mixed with sugar or a bit of whipped cream.

Another nice fluff which is well liked is prepared as follows: Grate a medium-sized apple and mix with sugar to taste, add an egg white and whip until stiff. This may be served with a thin custard sauce, ice cold, or the fluff heaped over small cup cakes.

Emergency Desserts.—Steam any leftover cake and serve with marshmallow sauce. Mix one cupful of brown sugar with three tablespoonfuls of flour, add one and one-half cupfuls of boiling water and cook until smooth, add a generous grating of nutmeg and two tablespoonfuls of butter with a dash of lemon juice and rind. Just before serving have the sauce boiling hot and add a few marshmallows cut into quarters.

Caramel Cornstarch Pudding.—Brown one-half cupful of sugar until it forms a sirup in the pan, then add a pint of boiling milk; stir until the caramel is dissolved—this will take time. Add two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch mixed with a little cold milk and cook until the starch is thoroughly cooked. Pour into sherbet glasses and garnish with a spoonful of whipped cream topped with a piece of preserved ginger for each glass.

Chicken Loaf.—Cook a fowl in water until the meat falls from the bones. Strain, put the broth into a saucepan and reduce to three cupfuls by boiling. Add one-half package of gelatin. Separate the meat from the bones and shred fine. Put the chicken into a well-rinsed mold, season the broth and pour over it. Set away to harden and serve on lettuce with mayonnaise dressing. A good imitation for a hurry-up dish is canned chicken with chicken broth or canned soup used instead of the fresh fowl.

Snowballs.—Spread cooked rice an inch thick over squares of coarse muslin wet in cold water. In the center of each place a canned peach or apricot, or pear. Tie carefully and steam ten minutes. Serve with a sauce prepared by thickening the fruit juice from the can, adding a little butter to make it richer.

Now in Good Health by Using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Lansing, Michigan.—"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound whenever I needed it. When I first used it I was so bad I could hardly walk across the room without crying. I was tired all the time. I think my trouble was coming on me for six months before I realized it. I read of your wonderful medicine in the paper, and * * * my husband bought me a bottle, and after the first few doses I felt better, so kept on taking it until I was well and strong. I take it at times when I feel tired and it helps me. I will always have a good word for your medicine and tell any-one what good it has done me. I recommended it to my neighbor for her girl, who is sixteen years old, and it was just what she needed. She is feeling fine now, and goes to school every day."—Mrs. E. F. > THE BEAVER
>
> Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more. He strays into the trapping grounds of Pierrot and Nepeese. Nepeese wounds Baree with a rifle, but he escapes. Baree decovers and learns nature's secrets rapidly. Nepeese is determined to catch Baree and tame him and tries again. Baree is strongly drawn to the girl, but still fears man.

Chapter V

Impelled by the wild alarm of the Willow's terrible cries and the sight of Pierrot dashing madly toward him from the dead body of Wakayoo, Baree did not stop running until it seemed as though his lungs could not draw another breath. When he stopped he was well out of the canyon and headed for the beaver pond.

Exactly wherein lay Baree's fears it would be difficult to say—but surely it was not because of Nepeese. The Willow had chased him hard. She had flung herself upon him. He had felt the clutch of her hands and the smother of her soft hair, and yet of her he was not afraid! If he stopped now and then in his flight and looked back, it was to see if Nepeese was following. He would not have run hard from her—alone. Her eyes and voice and hands had something stirring in him; he was awed with a greater yearning and a greater loneliness now—and that night he dreamed troubled dreams.

Baree was glad when the dawn came. He did not seek for food, but went down to the pond. There was little hope and anticipation in his manner now. He remembered that, as plainly as animal ways could talk, Umisk and his playmates had told him they wanted nothing to do with him. And yet the fact that they were there took away some of his loneliness. It was more than loneliness. The wolf in him was submerged. The dog was master. And in these passing moments, when the blood of the wild was almost dormant in him, he was depressed by the instinctive and growing feeling that he was not of that wild, but a fugitive in it, menaced on all sides by strange dangers.

Deep in the northern forests the beaver does not work and play in darkness only, but uses day even more than night, and many of Beaver-tooth's people were awake when Baree began disconsolately to investigate the shores of the pond. He did not try to hide himself now, and at least half a dozen beavers had a good look at him before he came to the point where the pond narrowed down to the width of the stream, almost half a mile from the dam. Then he wandered back. All that morning he hovered about the pond, showing himself openly.

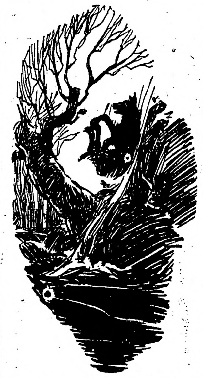
In their big mud-and-stick strongholds the beavers held a council of war. They were distinctly puzzled. There were four enemies which they dreaded above all others: The otter, who destroyed their dams in the winter time and brought death to them from cold and by lowering the water so they could not get to their food supplies; the lynx, who preyed on them all, young and old alike; and the fox and wolf, who would lie in ambush for hours in order to pounce on the very young, like Umisk and his playmates. If Baree had been any one of these four, wily Beaver-tooth and his people would have known what to do. But Baree was surely not an otter, and if he was a fox or a wolf or a lynx, his actions were very strange, to say the least. Half a dozen times he had the opportunity to pounce on his prey, if he had been seeking prey. But at no time had he shown the desire to harm them.

It may be that the beavers discussed the matter fully among themselves. It is possible that Umisk and his playmates told their parents of their adventure and of how Baree made no move to harm them when he could quite easily have caught them. However this may be, courageous old Beaver-tooth took it upon himself to end the suspense.

It was early in the afternoon that for the third or fourth time Baree walked out on the dam. This dam was fully two hundred feet in length, but at no point did the water run over it, the overflow finding its way through narrow sluices. A week or two ago Baree could have crossed to the opposite side of the pond on this dam, but now—at the far end—Beaver-tooth and his engineers were adding a new section of dam, and in order to accomplish their work more easily they had flooded fully fifty yards of the low ground on which they were working. The dam held a fascination for Baree. The top of it was high and dry, and there were dozens of smoothly worn little hollows in which the beavers had taken their sun-baths. In one of these hollows Baree stretched himself out, with his eyes on the pond. Not a ripple stirred its velvety smoothness. Not a sound broke the drowsy stillness of the afternoon. The beavers might have been dead or asleep, for all the stir they made. And yet they knew that Baree was on the dam. Where he lay the sun fell in a warm flood, and it was so comfortable that after a time he had difficulty in keeping his eyes open to watch the pond. Then he fell asleep.

Just how Beaver-tooth sensed this fact is a mystery. Five minutes later he came up quietly, without a splash or a sound, within fifty yards of Baree. For a few moments he scarcely moved in the water. Then he swam very slowly parallel with the dam across the pond. At the other side he drew himself ashore and for another minute sat as motionless as a stone, with his eyes on that part of the dam where Baree was lying. Not another beaver was moving, and it was very soon apparent that Beaver-tooth had but one object in mind—getting a closer observation of Baree. When he entered the water again, he swam along close to the dam. Ten feet beyond Baree he began to climb out. He did this with great slowness and caution. At last he reached the top of the dam.

A few yards away Baree was almost hidden in his hollow, only the top of his shiny black body appearing to Beaver-tooth's scrutiny. To get a better look, the old beaver spread his flat tail out beyond him and rose to a sitting posture on his hind quarters, his two front paws held squirrel-like over his breast. In this pose he was fully three feet tall. He probably weighed forty pounds, and in some ways he resembled one of those fat, good-natured, silly-looking dogs that go largely to stomach. But his brain was working with amazing celerity. Suddenly he gave the hard mud of the dam a single slap with his tail—and Baree sat up. Instantly he saw Beaver-tooth, and stared. Beaver-tooth stared. For a full half-minute neither moved the thousandth part of an inch. Then Baree stood up and wagged his tail.



In an Instant His Feet Shot Out From Under Him.

That was enough. Dropping to his forefeet, Beaver-tooth waddled leisurely to the edge of the dam and dived over. He was neither cautious nor in very great haste now. He made a great commotion in the water and swam boldly back and forth under Baree. When he had done this several times he cut straight up the pond to the largest of the three houses and disappeared. Five minutes after Beaver-tooth's exploit word was passing quickly among the colony. The stranger—Baree—was not a lynx. He was not a fox. He was not a wolf. Moreover, he was very young—and harmless. Work could be resumed. Play could be resumed. There was no danger. Such was Beaver-tooth's verdict.

If some one had shouted these facts in beaver language through a megaphone the response could not have been quicker. All at once it seemed to Baree, who was still standing on the edge of the dam, that the pond was alive with beavers. He had never seen so many at one time before. They were popping up everywhere, and some of them swam up within a dozen feet of him and looked him over in a leisurely and curious way. For perhaps five minutes they seemed to have no particular object in view. Then Beaver-tooth himself struck straight for the shore and climbed out. Others followed him. Half a dozen workers disappeared in the canals. As many more waddled out among the alders and willows. Eagerly Baree watched for Umisk and his chums. At last he saw them, swimming forth from one of the smaller houses. They climbed out on their playground—the smooth bar above the shore of mud. Baree wagged his tail so hard that his whole body shook, and hurried along the dam.

When he came out on the level strip of shore, Umisk was there alone, nibbling supper from a long, freshly cut willow. The other little beavers had gone into a thick clump of young alders.

This time Umisk did not run. He looked up from his stick. Baree squatted himself, wiggling in a most friendly and ingratiating manner. For a few seconds Umisk regarded him.

Then, very coolly, he resumed his supper.

* * * * * * *

Just as in the life of every man there is one big, controlling influence, either for good or for bad, so in the life of Baree the beaver pond was largely an arbiter of destiny. Where he might have gone if he had not discovered it, and what might have happened to him, are matters of conjecture. But it held him. It began to take the place of the old windfall, and in the beavers themselves he found a companionship which made up, in a way, for the loss of the protection and friendship of Kazan and Gray Wolf.

This companionship, if it could be called that, went just so far and no farther. With each day that passed the older beavers became more accustomed to seeing Baree. At the end of two weeks, if Baree had gone away, they would have missed him—but not in the same way that Baree would have missed the beavers. It was a matter of good-natured toleration on their part. With Baree it was different. He was still uskahis, as Nepeese would have said; he still wanted mothering; he was still moved by the puppyish yearnings which he had not yet had the time to outgrow; and when night came—to speak that yearning quite plainly—he had the desire to go into the big beaver house with Umisk and his chums, and sleep.

During the fortnight that followed Beaver-tooth's exploit on the dam Baree ate his meals a mile up the creek, where there were plenty of crawfish. But the pond was home. Night always found him there, and a large part of his day. He slept at the end of the dam, or on top of it on particularly clear nights, and the beavers accepted him as a permanent guest. They worked in his presence as if he did not exist.

He still could not induce Umisk and the other young beavers to join him in play, and after the first week or so he gave up his efforts. In fact, their play puzzled him almost as much as the dam-building operations of the older beavers. Umisk, for instance, was fond of playing in the mud at the edge of the pond. He was like a very small boy. Where his elders floated timbers from three inches to a foot in diameter to the big dam, Umisk brought small sticks and twigs no larger around than a lead pencil to his playground, and built a make-believe dam of his own.

Umisk would work an hour at a time on this play-dam as industriously as his father and mother were working on the big dam, and Baree would lie flat on his belly a few feet away, watching him and wondering mightily. He could see some reason for nibbling at sticks—he liked to sharpen his teeth on sticks himself; but it puzzled him to explain why Umisk so painstakingly stripped the bark from the sticks and swallowed it.

Another method of play still further discouraged Baree's advances. A short distance from the spot where he had first seen Umisk there was a shelving bank that rose ten or twelve feet from the water, and this bank was used by the young beavers as a slide. It was worn smooth and hard. Umisk would climb up the bank at a point where it was not so steep. At the top of the slide he would put his tail out flat behind him and give himself a shove, shooting down the toboggan and landing in the water with a big splash.

One afternoon, when the toboggan was particularly wet and slippery from recent use, Baree went up the beaver-path to the top of the bank, and began investigating. Nowhere had he found the beaver-smell so strong as on the slide. He began sniffing and incautiously went too far. In an instant his feet shot out from under him, and with a single wild yelp he went shooting down the toboggan. For the second time in his life he found himself struggling under water, and when a minute or two later he dragged himself up through the soft mud to the firmer footing of the shore, he had at last a very well-defined opinion of beaver play.

> Baree's stay with the beaver shows that at bottom he is more dog than wolf, and so fitted for human companionship.

Magellan First to Sail Around World

Ferdinand Magellan, a Portuguese, is credited with being the first man to sail around the world, although he was killed in the Philippine islands before the voyage was completed. He set out August 10, 1519, in the service of Spain, commanding five ships carrying 237 men. His purpose was to reach the Spice islands by sailing to the westward. November 28, 1520, he discovered the strait that now bears his name and sailed through into the Pacific ocean, across which he sailed 12,000 miles without finding inhabited land. After Magellan's death in the Philippines, April 17, 1521, his lieutenant, Sebastian del Cano, took command and continued the voyage. He reached San Lucar, near Seville, the starting point, with only one ship, the Vittoria, September 7, 1522. The journey had been accomplished in a trifle more than three years' time.—Kansas City Star.

Elephants Have Colds

Circus elephants often suffer from colds and the method of treating them is more or less difficult. However, one remedy that seems helpful at least is to make the elephant inhale boiling vinegar, which is done by half filling a bag with vinegar and hanging it over the elephant's trunk so that it has to inhale the fumes whether it wants to or not. The fumes are held to be quite beneficial.

WAR PLANNED ON SOW THISTLE

"Sow Thistle Must Go!" Is War-Cry Thruout Red River Valley.

Sow thistle eradication demonstrations will be carried on in several sections of the Valley this season by farmers cooperating with the Northwest Experiment Station, Crookston. The object of the campaign will be to encourage land owners to undertake eradication work, by demonstrating methods used by successful farmers, and by bringing directly to the farmer the results of investigations at the Crookston and other experiment stations.

Farmers are invited to write to the Northwest Experiment Stationregarding their experiences in sow thistle eradication. The station especially desires to get in touch with those who will carry on eradication practices this season. Bulletin on "The Sow Thistle Problem" will be sent to any address upon application.

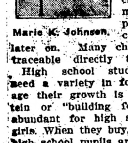
Rank Health With Three "Rs" Is Plea

By MARIE K. JOHNSON



Marie K. Johnson.

As an educational subject for children, health should hold equal rank with the three "R's" in the curriculum of public schools. Doctors declare that without a healthy, sturdy body it is impossible for the child to have a healthy, happy mind.

Neglect of childhood defects may result in permanent physical impairment later on. Many childhood ills are traceable directly to malnutrition.

High school students especially need a variety in foods for at this age their growth is rapid. The protein or "building food" should be abundant for high school boys and girls. When they buy their luncheons, high school pupils are apt to display a preference for chocolate sodas, cream puffs and candy. An appetizing luncheon put up at home is much to be preferred to the sort the boy or girl might obtain at the corner store near the school.

Meat is all right for the school luncheon but it should be put up in tempting form. If sliced thin it is more appetizing in sandwiches than if in thick pieces. Beverages or soup may be carried in thermos bottles but the bottles must be carefully washed and aired daily after using.

Milk is recommended for an important place in the boy's or girl's diet because of its proteins, minerals, phosphorus and calcium, necessary for the development of the body and in the case of calcium and phosphorus for the building of bone and teeth. Evaporated milk has come into favor as a health builder for children as well as adults because by removal of 60 per cent of the water it is rendered more than twice as rich in food value as ordinary milk and by a process called homogenizing more digestible than bottled market milk.

Crisp lettuce and celery, carefully washed and dried, may be so wrapped in oil paper that they will be fresh and in good condition at lunch time. Lettuce should not be used in sandwiches for wilted lettuce is almost indigestible.

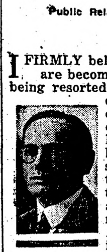
HOW ENDLESS CHAIN SELLING PLANS ARE USED TO ROB SAVERS

W. R. Morehouse Continues His Exposures of Modern "Gold Brick" Schemes—American Bankers Association Official Tells How Life-Time Savings Are Wiped Out.

By W. R. MOREHOUSE,
Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association.

ARTICLE NO. II



W. R. Morehouse

I FIRMLY believe that promoters and high-pressure salesmen are becoming more and more crafty. Shrewder ways are being resorted to in order to trap the novice investor. It is deplorable that the investor does not profit by experience and is victimized a second time in his endeavor to recover that which he has already lost. It is the old, old story of trying to recover, but in the attempt losing. This very hour thousands of hard-earned dollars have slipped from the grasp of the calloused hands that earned them into the clutches of unscrupulous skin-game artists. Tomorrow the scenes of today will be re-enacted with a new and larger list of victims. A month from today depositors will still be pouring an ever increasing volume of their savings into the hopper of unwise investments. A year from today the same tragedy will be re-enacted unless our savings bankers come to the rescue and help to stop this nefarious business of defrauding and swindling our savers of the fruits of their labors.

Here is a typical case. A group of men undertook to promote a vending or self-serving machine. Their plan called for the sale of $37,000,000 worth of leases in the United States. Similar projects previously started throughout the United States had failed. As a matter of fact, the average daily sale of one of these self-service machines was only $3.10, which in itself made it impossible for a machine to produce sufficient revenue to make it profitable. Servicing the machines was another obstacle which had not been successfully overcome. In three months the promoters were successful in selling over $2,500,000 worth of rights to use these machines.

$40,000 in Savings Lost by One Man

I know of one man who withdrew $40,000 from a savings bank and invested it in this promotion He told me it represented the accumulations of a lifetime. "And now I have lost it all," he said in a trembling voice. "I haven't a cent left and I am past sixty years of age—too old to work!" he added.

Of the more than $2,500,000 invested by savers, over $1,000,000 was taken by these wiley promoters as commission. Think of making a commission of over $1,000,000 on $2,500,000 of sales in about three months' time! Think of what this more than $1,000,000 of commission represents,—think of the struggles and the sacrifices of the men and women who saved it! With some it was saved penny by penny over a period of years. Think of the sorrow it caused,—the heartaches, the misery and the disappointment which followed in the wake of the collapse of this promotion. Think of the old man who lost $40,000—all he had been able to save during his lifetime. Think of "the widow's mite," for she lost it also. All that is left today of the original investment is less than 10 cents on every dollar.

Here is an endless chain scheme which relieved working girls of a portion of their savings. The loss ran into many thousands of dollars. The scheme is to sell silk hose to girls by getting them to act as selling agents. A hosiery company rents offices in the shopping district. Soon an attractive offer is made through the local newspapers by cleverly worded advertisements in which it would appear that any young lady can secure five pairs of hose worth $2 a pair for only $1. In other words, $10 worth of silk stockings for only $1! Without stopping to analyze the proposition or to consider how impossible it is for any concern to stay in business and sell $10 worth of silk hose for $1, thousands of young women instantly fall for the scheme.

How Endless Chain Catches Victims.

Here is how it catches its victims. Each victim pays $4 and receives three one dollar coupons which she must sell to her friends, and the friends must come in and pay down $4 each, get three coupons each which they must sell to three friends and then these friends must perpetuate the scheme by selling coupons to their friends and so on indefinitely.

Here is where the promoters make a clean-up. One of the conditions which must be met before the young woman who purchased the first coupons receives her $10 worth of hose for $1 is that all three to whom she sold her three coupons must come in, pay down $4 each for three more coupons and then go out and sell them. Before the three have done this, one or perhaps all three get "cold feet" on the proposition and, rather than go out and "soak" three of their friends $1 each, they simply give up the job and charge their loss to experience. But in doing so they also block the girl who purchased the first coupons from completing her contract, and of course she, too, loses the money she invested in the scheme.

At a glance the loss appears to be small, but the truth is the scheme is capable of such great expansion that it soon takes in hundreds and thousands of victims. This is but one of many endless chain schemes in use today in the United States.

(Article III will deal with land swindles and loan shark plans for robbing people of their savings.)

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

ON SAVING TO INVEST

"You have talked so much about saving, Aunt Emmy," said Hilda to Aunt Emmy, "that I wonder if you will be kind enough to help Jack and me work out a way to save regularly. We do so want to get ahead. As Jack is getting a little more money this year, we plan to save that and keep right on living on what we got last year. Of course, it is hard to do without a lot of things we might have, but then Jack and I both feel that we don't want to be worried about money. If we have a little reserve fund, we can be prepared for emergencies."

"Bless my heart!" exclaimed Aunt Emmy. "It surely does sound good to hear such sensible talk from a youngster these days! I'll tell you what I think is a good plan for you to follow,—open a savings account with a bank that has a thrift department and every week put away a stated sum in your savings account. You will receive interest on this money, you know. Of course you receive only a moderate rate of interest on your savings, so it is a good idea to make a definite investment plan and invest your savings in sound securities that will yield a higher rate of interest.

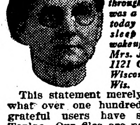
"Accumulate your money, small sums at a time, in your thrift or savings account. Determine what sum you will use for your initial investment, say, $100 or $500. Save until you have twice that amount. If you decide to begin your investment on $100 save $200, then take $100 and buy a baby bond, or buy a large bond on the installment plan and apply the $100 on the first payment, if you are sure you can save regularly enough to meet the other payments."

"Why not use the $200 and then begin all over again, Aunty?" queried Hilda.

"Because you ought to have some money on hand. You don't want to wipe out your whole savings, even for the best sort of investment."

"But how can we know what to invest in?" asked Hilda.

"Your bank will help you in that, my dear. Bankers are always glad to advise their customers concerning sound investments."—Anne B. Aymes.



New health in Tanlac

Old Folk "Sings"

Folk "sings" are made famous over the Shenandoah valley district of Virginia, says a Pathfinder reader, by large crowds of people congregating for all day singing of hymns and anthems found in the Harmonia Sacra, a songbook used for a century by the people of that valley. Every year, he says, about twenty of these sings are held in churches scattered over four counties. There are plenty of leaders and an abundance of food for all. He claims that there is nothing like a convention of this nature to bring together people of all religious affiliations and of all walks of life, to mingle and form ties of friendship, and to perpetuate the many fine spiritual hymns of long ago.—Pathfinder Magazine.

"A MAN-DEVIL"

Synopsis.—Part wolf, part dog—when two months old Baree has his first meeting with an enemy, Papayuchisew (young owl). Fighting hard, the antagonists are suddenly plunged into a swollen creek. Badly buffeted, and half drowned, Baree is finally flung on the bank, but the water has destroyed his sense of direction and he is lost, lonely and hungry. For many days his life is one of fear and distress. He meets various creatures of the wild and goes through a thunderstorm. He is learning more and more. He strays into the trapping grounds of Pierrot and Nepeese. Nepeese wounds Baree with a rifle, but he escapes. Baree decovers and learns nature's secrets rapidly. Nepeese is determined to catch Baree and tame him and tries again. Baree is strongly drawn to the girl, but still fears man. Baree makes friends with the beaver.

It may be that Umisk saw him. It may be that very soon the story of his adventure was known by all the inhabitants of Beaver Town. For when Baree came upon Umisk eating his supper of alder bark that evening, Umisk stood his ground to the last inch, and for the first time they smelled noses. At least Baree sniffed audibly, and plucky little Umisk sat like a rolled-up sphinx. That was the final cementing of their friendship—on Baree's part. He capered about extravagantly for a few moments, telling Umisk how much he liked him, and that they'd be great chums. Umisk didn't talk. He didn't make a move until he resumed his supper. But he was a companionable looking little fellow, for all that, and Baree was happier than he had been since the day he left the old windfall.

That friendship, even though it outwardly appeared to be quite one-sided, was decidedly fortunate for Umisk. When Baree was at the pond, he always kept as near to Umisk as possible, when he could find him. One day he was lying in a patch of grass, half asleep, while Umisk busied himself in a clump of alder-shoots a few yards away. It was the warning crack of a beaver tail that fully roused Baree; and then another and another, like pistol-shots. He jumped up. Everywhere beavers were scurrying for the pond.

Just then Umisk came out of the alders and hurried as fast as his short, fat legs would carry him toward the water. He had almost reached the mud when a lightning flash of red passed before Baree's eyes in the afternoon sun, and in another instant Napakasew—the he-fox—had fastened his sharp fangs in Umisk's throat. Baree heard his little friend's agonized cry; he heard the frenzied flap-flap-flap of many tails—and his blood pounded suddenly with the thrill of excitement and rage.

As swiftly as the red fox himself, Baree darted to the rescue. He was as big and as heavy as the fox, and when he struck Napakasew, it was with a ferocious snarl that Pierrot might have heard on the farther side of the pond, and his teeth sank like knives into the shoulder of Umisk's assailant. The fox was of a breed of forest highwaymen which kills from behind. He was not a fighter when it came fang-to-fang, unless cornered—and so fierce and sudden was Baree's assault that Napakasew took to flight almost as quickly as he had begun his attack on Umisk.

Baree did not follow him, but went to Umisk, who lay half in the mud, whimpering and snuffling in a curious sort of way. Gently Baree nosed him, and after a moment or two Umisk got up on his webbed feet, while fully twenty or thirty beavers were making a tremendous fuss in the water near the shore.

Chapter VI

While lovely Nepeese was shuddering over her thrilling experience under the rock—while Pierrot still offered grateful thanks in his prayers for her deliverance and Baree was becoming more and more a fixture at the beaver-pond—Bush McTaggart was perfecting a little scheme of his own up at Post Lac Bain, about forty miles north and west. McTaggart had been Factor at Lac Bain for seven years. In the Company's books down in Winnipeg he was counted a remarkably successful man. The expense of his post was below the average, and his semi-annual report of furs always ranked among the first. After his name, kept on file in the main office, was one notation which said: "Gets more out of a dollar than any other man north of God's lake."

The Indians knew why this was so. They called him Napao Wetikoo—the man-devil. This was under their breath—a name whispered sinisterly in the glow of tepee fires, or spoken softly where not even the winds might carry it to the ears of Bush McTaggart. They feared him; they hated him. They died of starvation and sickness, and the tighter Bush McTaggart clenched the fingers of his iron rule, the more meekly, it seemed to him, did they respond to his mastery. His was a small soul, hidden in the hulk of a brute, which rejoiced in power. And here—with the raw wilderness on four sides of him—his power knew no end. The Big Company was behind him. It had made him king of a domain in which there was little law except his own. And in return he gave back to the Company bales and bundles of furs beyond their expectation. It was not for them to have suspicions. They were a thousand or more miles away—and dollars counted.

Gregson might have told. Gregson was the investigating agent of that district, who visited McTaggart once each year. He might have reported that the Indians called McTaggart Napao Wetikoo because he gave them only half price for their furs; he might have told the Company quite plainly that he kept the people of the trap-lines at the edge of starvation through every month of the winter, that he had them on their knees with his hands at their throats—putting the truth in a mild and pretty way—and that he always had a woman or a girl, Indian or halfbreed, living with him at the Post. But Gregson enjoyed his visits too much at Lac Bain. Always he could count on two weeks of coarse pleasures; and in addition to that, his own womenfolk at home wore a rich treasure of fur that came to them from McTaggart.

One evening, a week after the adventure of Nepeese and Baree under the rock, McTaggart sat under the glow of an oil lamp in his "store." For six weeks there had been in him a great unrest. It was just six weeks ago that Pierrot had brought Nepeese on her first visit to Lac Bain since McTaggart had been Factor there. She had taken his breath away. Since then he had been able to think of nothing but her. Twice in that six weeks he had gone down to Pierrot's cabin. Tomorrow he was going again. Marie, the slim Cree girl over in his cabin, he had forgotten—just as a dozen others before Marie had slipped out of his memory. It was Nepeese now. He had never seen anything quite so beautiful as Pierrot's girl.

Audibly he cursed Pierrot as he looked at a sheet of paper under his hand, on which for an hour or more he had been making notes out of worn and dusty Company ledgers. It was Pierrot who stood in his way. Pierrot's father, according to those notes, had been a full-blooded Frenchman. Therefore Pierrot was half French, and Nepeese was quarter French—though she was so beautiful he could have sworn there was not more than a drop or two of Indian—Chippewayan, Cree, Ojibway, Dog Rib—anything—there would have been no trouble at all in the matter. He would have bent them to his power, and Nepeese would have come to his cabin, as Marie came six months ago. But there was the accursed French of it! Pierrot and Nepeese were different. And yet—

He smiled grimly, and his hands clenched tighter. After all, was not his power sufficient? Would even Pierrot dare stand against that? If Pierrot objected, he would drive him from the country—from the trapping regions that had come down to him as heritage from father and grandfather, and even before their day. He would make of Pierrot a wanderer and an outcast, as he had made wanderers and outcasts of a score of others who had lost his favor. No other Post would sell to or buy from Pierrot if Le Bete—the black cross—was put after his name. That was his power—a law of the Factors that had come down through the centuries. It was a tremendous power for evil. It had brought him Marie, the slim, dark-eyed Cree girl, who hated him—and in spite of her hatred "kept house for him." That was the polite way of explaining her presence if explanations were ever necessary.

McTaggart looked again at the notes he had made on the sheet of paper. Pierrot's trapping country, his own property according to the common law of the wilderness, was very valuable. During the last seven years he had received an average of a thousand dollars a year for his furs, for McTaggart had been unable to cheat Pierrot quite as completely as he had cheated the Indians. A thousand dollars a year! Pierrot would think twice before he gave that up. McTaggart chuckled as he made his way through the darkness to the door. Nepeese as good as belonged to him. He would have her if it cost—Pierrot's life. And—why not? It was all so easy. A shot on a lonely trap-line, a single knife-thrust—and who would know? Who would guess where Pierrot had gone? And it would all be Pierrot's fault. For the last time he had seen Pierrot, he had made an honest proposition: he would marry Nepeese. Yes, even that. He had told Pierrot so. He had told Pierrot that when the latter was his father-in-law, he would pay him double price for furs.

And Pierrot had stared—had stared with that strange, stunned look in his face, like a man dazed by a blow from a club. And so if he did not get Nepeese without trouble it would all be Pierrot's fault. Tomorrow McTaggart would start again for the halfbreed's country. And the next day Pierrot would have an answer for him. Bush McTaggart chuckled again when he went to bed.

Until the next to the last day Pierrot said nothing to Nepeese about what had passed between him and the Factor at Lac Bain. Then he told her.

"He is a beast—a man-devil," he said, when he had finished. "I would rather see you out there—with her—dead." And he pointed to the tall spruce under which the princess mother lay.

Nepeese had not uttered a sound. But her eyes had grown bigger and darker, and there was a flush in her cheeks which Pierrot had never seen there before. She stood up when he had done, and she seemed taller to him. Never had she looked quite so much like a woman, and Pierrot's eyes were deep-shadowed with fear and uneasiness as he watched her while she gazed off into the northwest—toward Lac Bain.

She was wonderful, this slip of a girl-woman. Her beauty troubled him. He had seen the look in Bush McTaggart's eyes. He had heard the thrill in McTaggart's voice. He had caught the desire of a beast in McTaggart's face. It had frightened him at first. But now—he was not frightened. He was uneasy, but his hands were clenched. In his heart there was a smoldering fire. At last Nepeese turned and came and sat down beside him again, at his feet.

"He is coming tomorrow, ma cherie," he said. "What shall I tell him?"

The Willow's lips were red. Her eyes shone. But she did not look up at her father.

"Nothing, Nootawe—except that you are to say to him that I am the one to whom he must come—for what he seeks."

Pierrot bent over and caught her smiling. The sun went down. His heart sank with it, like cold lead.

• • • • • • •

From Lac Bain to Pierrot's cabin the trail cut within half a mile of the beaver pond, a dozen miles from where Pierrot lived; and it was here, on a twist of the creek in which Wakayoo had caught fish for Baree, that Bush McTaggart made his camp for the night. Only twenty miles of the journey could be made by canoe, and as McTaggart was traveling the last stretch afoot, his camp was a simple affair—a few cut balsams, a light blanket, a small fire. Before he prepared his supper the Factor drew a number of copper-wire snares from his small pack and spent half an hour in setting them in rabbit runways. This method of securing meat was far less arduous than carrying a gun in hot weather, and it was certain. Half a dozen snares were good for at least three rabbits, and one of these three was sure to be young and tender enough for the frying-pan. After he had placed his snares McTaggart set a skillet of bacon over the coals and boiled his coffee.

Of all the odors of a camp, the smell of bacon reaches farthest in the forest. It needs no wind. It drifts on its own wings. On a still night a fox will sniff it a mile away—twice that far if the air is moving in the right direction. It was this smell of bacon that came to Baree where he lay in his hollow on top of the beaver dam.

Since his experience in the canyon and the death of Wakayoo, he had not fared particularly well. Caution had held him near the pond, and he had lived almost entirely on crawfish. This new perfume that came with the night wind roused his hunger. But it was elusive: now he could smell it—the next instant it was gone. He left the dam and began questing for the source of it in the forest, until after a time he lost it altogether. McTaggart had finished frying his bacon and was eating it.

Enter the villain, Bush McTaggart! How does Baree fit into the situation.

Blood Analysis Helps Doctor in Diagnosis

The doctor who used to feel his patient's pulse or gaze into a gaping mouth to determine the cause of illness nowadays takes a drop of blood to analyze. The guilt for much of human suffering has been traced to the germs, tiny but deadly, which force their entrance into the human body, and which can only be detected by such analysis.

"Blood tests provide us with clews to an ever-growing number of ailments," said a doctor to the writer.

"It is being found, for instance, that eye complaints are often due to the absorption of germs which have affected other parts of the body, such as the tonsils. We can often detect them by testing the blood.

"Many cases of illness are due to something taken in from without—usually microscopic germs. More and more of these germs are becoming known to us every day. There is reason to believe that the origins of other diseases which are still unknown may be found in the same cause."

But Wait a Few Years

Little Esther, who was drawing near to her third birthday, was taken by her mother to be fitted for a new hat. She protested, "What for do I want another hat? I'se got only one head." Her father tells this story with great gusto.—Boston Transcript.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

FAME and fortune are things that not everyone can have. But to have a friend, even though he be only a four-legged one, compensates for a lot of things. In the public ward of the hospital in which I once dwelt, there lay a human derelict. He had no visitors, he had no money, but he did have one friend.

Day and night for eleven weeks a yellow creature of the type commonly referred to as "pup," "ki-yoodle," or "cur" gave a marvelous exhibition of loyalty while pawing out a living from the garbage cans at the rear of the hospital where his owner was confined.

Pete—for that, I understand, was the dog's name—never left the sidewalk, from the day he arrived in the wake of the patrol wagon in which his friend was brought. Once he eluded the doorman, gained admittance to the hospital and found his way to a cot. There he heard "his master's voice." Whatever understanding they had between them seemed to satisfy Pete, for he went out and resumed his vigil at the door.

Every box office treasurer hears of defective vision and hearing so often he thinks an eye and ear hospital should adjoin every theater. A prospective patron mumbled something about, "Can't see very well and a little deaf," to Charles Thomas in the box office at the Century theater in New York last week. At the moment Thomas was toying with a bank pin which he accidentally flicked out of his hand to the public side of the window.

The patron, a courteous, middle-aged woman, immediately stooped with alacrity, picked up the pin from the floor and restored it to Thomas through the window. The treasurer could not resist a smile at the thought of the alleged defective vision. The woman "got wise" also.

"I'm taking my grandmother," she said. "It's she who can't see very well and it's my hearing that's bad."

◇

Someone is always inquiring how my trouble started, and how did it happen, meaning, when did I first notice I had been shell-shocked in the battle of life. That question is about as easy to answer as "How high is up?" It is as impossible to determine when it started as it is when it will end. And the contributing causes were as numerous as the treatments. It came slowly and gradually. The doctor said it would leave the same way. I know now he was right about the "slowly." But I have found out what hope is. It's the thing that, when you are playing solitaire and find yourself stuck without a move, makes you run through the deck once more trusting you'll find a way out. That's hope.

Whatever illusion I may have had that I was good copy was dissipated recently by my nurse.

In taking me out of bed she always lifts my feet first before attempting to hoist me up. The other day she swung me around, and, reaching under my shoulders, stood me on my feet. I landed right in the waste basket that was standing near the bed. Which makes me wonder if she is as ignorant of newspaper customs as she pretends to be. If it really was accidental or if she has a news sense. One thing is certain, that if she dumps me in the wastebasket I will escape the composing room and will not be left in the overset.

Some time when you are "bored to tears," suffering from ennui or delving for a new thrill just try bringing (not sending) a few boxes of candy to the children's hall of some hospital. Or a few cartons of cigarettes to the men's hall (be sure to include matches), or a few baskets of fruit to the women's hall.

Ask the person in charge to let you see her distribute it, and if you don't say you have had the thrill of your life it is time for you to leave this planet and seek a new universe, for there isn't a thrill left in you.

"Do you think I'm happy?" as the late-lamented Joe Welch used to say in opening his monologue. I was far from it. I was not having half the fun in the hospital that my mental flip-flops might have led others to believe. Those who know me can hardly imagine me convulsed with joy at having to lie on my back all done up like Joan of Arc, staring at the ceiling of a sunless room for four years. The only outside views of life I had were through a window, which overlooked some factories and wholesale houses.

But there was one other thing to be seen through the window and whenever I felt myself yielding to an attack of self-pity I looked at it—the flag atop the Fourteenth street armory. The sight of it made me think of those boys who got their wounds doing some real good for the world and are still in casts and braces and on hospital cots far from home and friends. When I compared my lot with theirs it made me hate my impatience and wish I could divide some of my luxuries and comfort with them. It wasn't treason—but it seemed to me that the theatrical folk were taking better care of their wounded than the government was.

Queer Animal Deaths

Swallows are not infrequently killed by golf balls. Fledgling birds get hanged by falling from their nests and catching their heads in strands of horsehair of which the nests are made. Rabbits are occasionally run over by cyclists on lonely roads at dusk. Wader birds get trapped by strongly moored mussels or oysters which close suddenly, catching the birds by the beak when they peck to investigate food possibilities. Gulls have several times been hooked by diving for, and swallowing fish which were being pulled in by anglers.—Manchester Guardian.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Fairmont—The old site of Fort Fairmont, built during the Sioux Indian uprising in 1862, is to be marked by a monument and tablet which will be unveiled.

Minneapolis—A resident fishing license law for Minnesota was recommended by the Izaak Walton league of Minnesota at its third annual convention.

St. Paul—The house of representatives passed a bill authorizing the secretary of the navy to deliver to the state of Minnesota the silver service set which was in use on the battleship Minnesota.

Aitkin—Brush fires fanned by strong winds destroyed buildings on the William Feist farm and threatened the other farms, where buildings caught fire. Fifty sticks of dynamite exploded at the Feist place.

Stillwater—William Bonse, a fireman, was seriously injured in a fire that destroyed the old Colonel R. F. Hersey mansion, a landmark for 40 years. The loss was estimated at $30,000.

Virginia—Planting of 100,000 trees in Minnesota this year is one of the principal goals of the Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. Willard Bayliss, Chisholm, told delegates to the Eighth District Federation of Women's Clubs convention here.

St. Paul—Because of crowded conditions prevailing at the St. Cloud reformatory, which means that there are too many men to do the limited amount of work available, the state board of visitors has requested that additional means of employment be provided.

St. Cloud—15 prisoners from the reformatory at St. Cloud who went on a "food strike" when meals failed to please them, were locked in cells at the state prison at Stillwater, where they were transferred under heavy guard a few hours after their demonstration.

Felton—A prairie fire which started about six miles southeast of here, burning over an area five miles wide and seven miles long, taking with it 300 tons of hay, considerable farm machinery and an old barn, was finally subdued after fire fighters had worked furiously through the night.

St. Paul—James A. Larson, long a prominent figure in political life of Minnesota, is dead after a three months' illness. Mr. Larson represented Redwood county in the legislature for three terms, was assistant secretary of state for 14 years, and for a number of years served on the republican state committee.

St. Paul—Declaring that the low water levels of the Leech lake district threaten extinction of the fish in the lake chain emptying into the Mississippi river at Federal Dam, J. F. Gould, Minnesota game and fish commissioner, telegraphed the Minnesota delegation in congress urging governmental action to reduce the flow of water through the dam.

Minneapolis—An army of 100,000 citizens and school children of Minnesota, on the opening day of American Forest week, was enlisted to stop destruction of Minnesota forest resources worth $275,000,000, to launch a program of reforestation and forest conservation aimed at preventing Minnesota's 10,000 lakes from drying up, and to plant 50,000 trees in the state.

Rush City—Three men, two of whom had just completed voyages across the Atlantic, were drowned in Rush lake, it was revealed after the finding of the third body. The dead, Minnesota's first fishing victims of the year, are: John Krueger, 23, Graham, Minn.; Wilhelm Backhus, 22, of Germany; Bartholemews Bruinaars, 19, of Holland.

Minneapolis—Ending a lively legal battle, punctuated at frequent intervals by clashes between government and defense attorneys, United States Commissioner Howard S. Abbott ordered seven of eight Minneapolis men charged with complicity in the alleged $140,000,000 alcohol syndicate conspiracy to appear for trial in the federal court at Cleveland, Ohio, May 11.

Marshall—Tons of dirt and silt, fine as powder, churned up from newly plowed fields by a 50-mile wind, and sent swirling into the air like great black clouds, covered a dozen counties in southwestern Minnesota in one of the strangest dust storms in the state for many years. The air was so heavily laden with dust during the storm that motorists had to drive with headlights burning. Drifts of dust buried fence posts to within two feet of the top near Marshall.

St. Paul—Edvard W. Stark, Minnesota state treasurer, filed last week as a candidate to succeed himself at the November election. Mr. Stark has been state treasurer since July 1, 1925, when he was appointed to that office by Governor Theodore Christianson, following the resignation of Henry Rines, who resigned to become a member of the commission of administration and finance. Mr. Stark was born in Chisago county, Minnesota, in 1869.

St. Paul—One of the largest and best equipped commissary headquarters in the world will be opened in the coach yards of the St. Paul Union station May 1st, when the Northern Pacific railway, as part of its $600,000 expansion program, will install the new department with its complete line of dining car equipment and materials.

Winona—A proposal to lease Lake Winona to the United States government for a period of 20 years, as a part of the Upper Mississippi river game and fish refuge, is under consideration of the city council.

GREENS ARE GOOD EATING

The best of spring tonics are found in Mother Nature's own garden in the form of greens which are often weeds, but are much more wholesome than any tonic taken from a bottle.

This craving for green foods is gratified by serving the crisp, raw leaves, which are rich in iron, sulphur, lime and phosphorus, and at the same time because of their fibrous mixture afford a most effectual internal cleanser. If eaten with the snappy French dressing, this, too is a stimulant, exciting the digestive organs, particularly the pancreas. The oil is a lubricant, so, with the acid and greens, it is easy to see how necessary green food is in the diet.

When planting a garden the weeding out for thinning should always be planned as a salad. Such small plants as turnips, cabbage, onions, beets, when very young, are delicious served raw, or later cooked in the form of cooked greens.

Wild mustard, sorrel, dock, cress and milkweed shoots are uncultivated greens which are rich in vitamines. The young shoots of milkweed when cooked taste much like asparagus.

Dandelion Hot Slaw.—Take about three quarts of carefully picked and washed dandelion leaves. Fry out diced bacon in a hot skillet, then lay in the well-drained leaves, cover and simmer until the leaves are well wilted. Mix salt, pepper, a tablespoonful of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of cream, adding enough vinegar to add zest to the dressing, add two beaten eggs and stir until well blended—not directly over the heat; pour over the greens and serve hot.

Blanched dandelion leaves found under boards or in sheltered spots are delicious cut up and served with shredded green onion and a French dressing.

Black walnuts, a half cupful coarsely chopped, sprinkled over a custard pie makes a most delicious, rich pie, if one likes the black walnut flavor.

Baked Eggs With Cheese.—Break four eggs into a buttered baking dish and cook in a hot oven until they begin to turn white around the edges. Cover the eggs with a white sauce, and over this a cupful of cheese and over the cheese a cupful of buttered crumbs. Bake until the crumbs are brown.

Sweets From Honey.

Those who "keep a bee" these days will find it most profitable. There are so many delicious dishes which may be prepared from honey. For the children there is no sweet more wholesome. A hive of bees in every back yard will furnish honey for a year. They tell us that the average hive yields 60 pounds of honey.

Honey Candy.—To one quart of strained honey take six tablespoonfuls of butter, two tablespoonfuls of vinegar and boil until it hardens in water. Flavor with a teaspoonful each of almond and lemon extract, add one-half teaspoonful of soda and pour into buttered pans to cool. Mark off into squares before it gets too hard.

Honey Fruit Cake.—Warm one-half cupful of brown sugar and one cupful of honey until it hardens in cold water. Remove from the heat, add one-half teaspoonful of soda, and all the puffed rice, wheat or popcorn that can be stirred into it.

Honey Blanc Mange.—Moisten six tablespoonfuls of cornstarch with one-fourth of a cupful of milk, add two cupfuls of boiling milk, and cook eight minutes; then add a pinch of salt and one cupful of honey. Mold in cups and serve with honey and cream, adding sprinkled nuts over each mold if desired.

Cauliflower Soup.—With a cupful or less or more of cooked cauliflower, a most tasty creamed soup may be prepared. Put the vegetable through a sieve and add to hot milk, season well and bind with two tablespoonfuls of butter and one of flour cooked well in the soup.

Asparagus Rabbit.—Cook diced asparagus until tender. Cover buttered toast with the cooked sliced asparagus, sprinkled with grated cheese, salt, cayenne and a little worcestershire sauce. Place in a hot oven or under the gas flame for a few minutes to melt the cheese. Serve at once with a poached egg in the center if desired.

Lemons will keep for several weeks if put into a dish of fresh water and the water is changed occasionally washing the lemons.

Honey mixed with orange or any fruit juice with a bit of lemon juice makes a good dressing for a fruit cocktail.

Honey in place of sugar for doughnuts adds to their flavor and they do not dry so rapidly as those made of sugar.

NO WOMAN CAN KEEP HOUSE EFFICIENTLY

Without Good Health

MRS. FRANK DINDORE

Four Walls Can Make a House, but it takes a Woman to Make a Home

To be a successful homemaker, a woman must guard her health. When mother is not well, the home is upset. Women everywhere are learning through their own personal experiences, as these women did, the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Lancaster, Ohio.—"For ten years after my marriage, I had poor health. I was on a visit to my sister in Utica, Michigan, and she had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Her husband got me a bottle and I took it and felt so much better that I got a second one. Now, whenever I feel run-down I take the Vegetable Compound and soon feel all right again. I have had three little girls in the last six years and do all my housework, sewing, washing, and ironing. My time is pretty well taken up, but I will answer any letters I receive."—Mrs. Frank Dindore, 823 Pierve Avenue, Lancaster, Ohio.

Sturgis, Michigan.—"I am very thankful for what your medicine has done for me and have recommended it to others. I took it to give me strength before my baby was born. I would have to stop work and lie down sometimes all the afternoon. I felt as if I did not care whether anything was done or not. I got tired out so easily. One day I found a little book on my porch and that night I showed it to my husband and he went down town and got me a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. The medicine has helped me so much that I was soon able to do my work, and when my baby was born, my nurse, Mrs. Forbes, said it was the easiest birth she had ever attended. I will be more than pleased if I am helping someone else by giving my testimonial."—Mrs. Edward Persing, 208 Surprise Ave., Sturgis, Michigan.

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgagee hereinafter named are authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and payable and they hereby do declare said sum due and payable, which mortgage was executed by Sophie Jefferson and Christ Jefferson, her husband, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated November 15th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minneosta, on the 20th day of November, A. D. 1920, at 8 o'clock A. M., in Book 104 of Mortgages, on page 31.

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, joint owners, payable to either or survivor, by written assignment, dated December 17th, A. D. 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, A. D. 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 455;

And whereas, the said Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, the assignees and holders of said mortgage have duly elected and do hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2,000.00), with accumulated interest from the 15th day of November, 1923, at the rate of six and one-half per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof;

NOW THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz:

Lots Six, Seven, Ten and Eleven (6, 7, 10 & 11), of Section Three (3), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty-two (42) West of the 5 P. M., containing one hundred sixty-two and 48-100 acres, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota.

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the Front door of the County Court House, at Warren, in said County and State on the 1st day of June, 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Seventy-five Dollars attorneys fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

Dated April 12th, 1926.

MARY O'MALLEY and NELLIE O'MALLEY,
Assignees of Mortgagee.

W. J. SMITH,
Attorney for Assignees of Mortgagee,
Morgan Block,

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of Two Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 ($292.50) Dollars, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice, upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by W. W. Prichard, Sr., and Anita R. Prichard, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, bearing date the 27th day of March, 1922, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, 1922, at 1 o'clock P. M. in Book 103 of Mortgages, on page 208;

Which said Mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment dated the 30th day of July, 1923, and recorded in the office of said Register of Deeds, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages on page 461;

AND WHEREAS, The said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the Assignee and Holder of said Mortgage has duly elected and does hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said Mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said Mortgage and the power of sale therein contained; and whereas there is actually due and claimed to be due and payable at the date of this notice the sum of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 Dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of 6½ per cent per annum from the 3rd day of April, 1926, and whereas the said power of sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage, or any part thereof;

Now, Therefore, Notice is Hereby Given, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The South Half of the Southeast quarter of Section Number Twenty-nine (29), the Southwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter of Section Number Twenty-eight (28), and the West Half of the Northwest Quarter of Section Number Thirty-three (33), in Township Number One Hundred Fifty-five (155), North of Range Number Forty-four (44), West of the Principal Meridian, containing according to the United States Government Survey thereof, two hundred (200) acres be the same more or less, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren in said County and State, on the 19th day of June 1926, at 2 o'clock P. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 Dollars, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and Seventy-five and No-100 Dollars, Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the date of sale, as provided by law.

Dated May 3rd A. D. 1926.

Patrons, Attention!

Don't forget to place your order for a Cooling Tank before the weather gets warm. It is communities that have patrons using cooling tanks that produce the best kind of cream during the warm weather.

Cream should be cooled in cold water immediately after separation, both summer and winter. It doesn't take long to cool same if you use a cream stirrer and a pail or two of real cold water. It is the animal heat you want to get out, and it should be gotten out quickly.

The warm weather is here so don't forget that cream will sour very easily. It is important to deliver your cream three times a week and moreso now if you are trying to get the extra 2 cents which we pay for Land O' Lakes cream. Remember to taste your cream the last thing you do before starting for the creamery with it. It is through this cooperation that you will learn to know what kind of quality we need in order to make a Land O' Lakes product. Second importance is to deliver cream before noon, especially so during the summer months.

If you will remember these two important suggestions it will mean a lot to you and to us insofar as making a better showing for us in the way of increasing our Land O' Lakes butter and to you it will mean more money say nothing about what it means to be a patron that has delivered the kind of cream that classifies your creamery as a Land O' Lakes creamery.

C. Jefferson and family left Friday for St. Paul where they will make their home. They moved up here to Holt about ten years ago from St Paul and have been engaged in farming southeast of town until last week when they sold out.

Fire, Fire!

Monday morning at 2 o'clock all the available men in town were roused out of sweet dreams by the fire bell. It was found, upon investigation, that a Ford sedan belonging to L. J. Johnson of Clearbrook, had caught fire a quarter of a mile north of town near by the H. B. Young home. Nothing could be done to save it, so it was completely ruined.

Tuesday night at about eleven the fire alarm again clanged, and this time it was found that the R. L. Adams residence, occupied by R. A. Holmgren southwest of the schoolhouse was in flames. An emergency fireman's brigade came to the scene in a remarkable short time, and succeeded in saving all the furniture on the first floor. Nothing could be done to throttle the flames, which had gained a good start, so the house burned to the ground.

Mrs. Holmgren and little son were in Grand Forks at the time of the catastrophe. Mr. Holmgren had been to Grygla in the evening, and when he came home he saw a light upstairs. Upon opening the door, he was met with a cloud of smoke, and immediately turned in the alarm.

The loss was fairly well covered by insurance.

Contest Held in New Solum

Large Crowd Attended Program

Last Saturday evening, in a packed house we had one of the most interesting programs that has ever been given in District No. 30 [New Solom], and this is due mostly to the teachers, the Misses Larson and Roseland. The Declamatory Contest, between Dists. 28 and 30, began by singing a number of songs, led by Miss Roseland. Later the singing was continued under the leadership of Prof. Laron from Crookston, and everybody had to sing and smile. It was a pleasure to be there.

The contest was very interesting, as each contestant gave his part almost perfectly. The judges, Mr. Larson from Crookston, Supt. Engen, and Miss Johnson, from Warren, found it somewhat hard to judge, as the first and and second were close.

Ethel Hoyum took first in Dist. 28, and Alvin Olson took first in Dist. 30.

After the contest a free lunch was served which also fitted in well with the rest of the program. About twelve o'clock the people left the schoolhouse feeling more at peace with the world as well as with themselves.

Too much praise cannot be given the teachers for their interest and untired efforts shown with their pupils. We feel very grateful to Mr. Engen, Mr. Larson, and Miss Johnson for coming so far to help us.

Fiddlers' Contest To Be Held Here

The Management of the local theater is staging an "Old Time Fiddlers Contest" next Friday night May 21. The first prize is $5.00 cash and the second prize is $3.00 cash. Several Fiddlers have already signed up for the contest but the contest is still open and any fiddlers may sign up any time for the contest.

There is no age restriction. The only rule is that all the fiddlers have to play old time music. The Audience will be the judges.

The Theater has booked a very good picture to go with the contest and it will be one big evening for all.

Mother's Cook Book

There is only one way to get ready for immortality, and that is to love this life and live it as bravely and faithfully and carefully as we can.—Henry Van Dyke.

SOME FISH DISHES

FISH are always in season, fresh or canned, and many wholesome dishes may be prepared by using the seasonable kinds of those whose prices agree with one's purse. There is no way of serving the firm-fleshed fresh fish like roasting. Fill with the following stuffing and bake until very tender:

Piquant Stuffing.

Pour half a cupful of vinegar over three cupfuls of bread crumbs, squeeze dry and add to the crumbs one-half cupful of melted butter, one cupful of chopped olives, three chopped pickles, one small green pepper and curry powder to taste.

Broiled Fish.

Any good-sized fish of firm flesh is good for broiling. Split the fish, remove the backbone and brush with melted butter, broil over a clear coal fire if possible, or under a gas flame. A five-pound fish will require a half an hour. Serve with latticed potatoes which have been fried brown.

Fresh Fish Balls.

Flake any left-over cooked fish and mix with an equal quantity of seasoned mashed potatoes, fresh and hot; make into balls, add egg and dip into egg and crumbs.

Baked Trout With Shrimp Sauce.

Wash and dry a large trout. Gash each side in half a dozen places and lay in each gash a strip of fat salt pork. Brush the fish inside and out with melted butter mixed with lemon juice. Put a rack in a baking pan; on it lay the fish, pour a cupful of boiling water into the bottom of the pan and place in a very hot oven. Allow 12 minutes to the pound for cooking and baste three or four times during the cooking. Cook together one tablespoonful each of butter and flour, add the water from the pan after removing the fish, season with salt, pepper, a little kitchen bouquet, add a tablespoonful of lemon juice and one-half cupful of finely-chopped shrimps. If the sauce is too thick add boiling water. Garnish with parsley and lemon quarters.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT

By F. A. WALKER

MASTERING SELF

THE serious matter of mastering self, of subduing at the right moment the flame of passion when it begins to hiss and flare up, calls for exceptional patience of which most of us are sadly deficient.

A glaring eye, without a word being spoken, may sever the friendship of years and set humans fighting and clutching at each other's throats.

"He that is slow to anger," says the good Book, "is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

How many hearts have ached for days and days, because of an angry word, spoken in a fit of bitter resentment!

How many homes have been undone for the same reason.

Impassable gulfs have suddenly opened which time can never bridge, because two hot-headed persons have lost control of their tempers, and are too proud to admit their error.

Ill humor, asperity, frowns, scowls and angry words, if you will consider the results they produce, will be found to be the direct cause of more failures in life than the lack of ability.

Men and women of temperament, quick to the touch, as a hair-trigger, have frequently lost prized opportunities in a moment of irascibility, by blurting out a snarling word which a day later they would gladly give anything they own to recall.

Even death, which might have been averted by self-control, has occurred from a sudden burst of passion followed by a seething storm of words.

If something rankles your spirit, or sets your heart pounding at an unusual speed, say nothing until you can compose yourself.

Cares, anxieties, sorrows and disappointments in many lives will be found to be the kins of tiffs, tantrums, irritability and a contentious spirit.

Try to forget them by cultivating new thoughts and a closer communion with faith and the great outdoors.

Whether a principal or a subordinate, the one thing under all conditions to do when in a state of mental disturbance is to hold your tongue until the peppery storm subsides, and you feel and know that you are once more capable of mastering self.

WHEN I WAS TWENTY-ONE

BY JOSEPH KAYE

At 21—Zona Gale Was Earning $15 a Week.

"AT THE age of twenty-one I was employed on the staff of the Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin at a salary of $15 a week.

"At that time my ambition was to write fiction and plays—the only ambition connected with work which I have ever had, save to write much better stuff than I had already written.—Zona Gale."

TODAY—Zona Gale is one of America's leading writers. In one respect she is unique among American women writers in that she produces both novels and plays. No other American authoress has done that save Rida Johnson Young, and she is known more as a librettist and playwright than as a novelist.

The work that brought Miss Gale fame was "Miss Lulu Bett," a novel which won the Pulitzer prize for the best American novel of the year and which later, in dramatic form, had a long run in New York and throughout the country. The second play of Zona Gale's, "Mr. Pitt," also dramatized by her from one of her novels, was produced, but did not duplicate the success of her first stage venture.

HEARTS COURAGEOUS

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

WHO are your heroes? Though the brave
Deserve the tribute of the free,
I'm sure not all the banners wave
Above the ranks of chivalry.
For some no banners wave at all;
And yet some heroes I recall
With hearts courageous, though no scrolls
Pay tribute to their fighting souls.

I know a woman, one who had
Husband and house, and wealth and ease,
Yes, all the things that make you glad
Who know the joy of things like these;
And then she lost them, one by one;
They slipped away as slips the sun,
Until she stood as stands the lone
Old oak when all the birds have flown.

As stands the oak! For still she stood,
Her roots in earth, her head in heaven,
And spoke of life as something good,
And thought of grief as something given.
However hard her hardest mile,
She wore for poverty a smile,
And talked of God in all her grief
With stronger faith and more belief.

And I, who have my petty loss,
Seek not new courage in old tales;
I see a woman with a cross,
Yet one whose laughter never fails.
Who are your heroes? You who read
The story of some stranger's deed,
May seek the brave in tales of war
While some great soul smiles on next door.

The Hotel Stenographer

By Roe Fulkerson

"LOOK at 'em smoking!" said the House Detective with disapproval.

"I see 'em every day, drop into the lobby here to puff a coffin tack," answered the Hotel Stenographer, glancing at three girls in a big divan in Peacock Alley. "I don't mind 'em, Kelly, because I know it is not their fault.

"I do not smoke, though I do not deserve any particular credit for being one of the few who do not. We are all the result of our home training. Those girls live in families where fathers and mothers play twenty-five-cent limit, and both sides of the family carry a cigarette case. Of course they smoke. Youngsters imitate their parents from the time they play house, and dress up in their parents' clothes to do it.

"I come from a family where father still drinks his coffee out of a mustache cup.

"My mother is religious, too, and her children are all hand-spanked. I am past twenty-one, but not past spanking, and if I lit one of those things in our flat, I know what would happen to me, although I would not be in a position to see it. We still put all the dinner on the table at one time and say grace, so I would hardly be expected to smoke.

"As the lady said, when her daughter fell in the well, it is mighty hard to raise a daughter, but most of us imitate our mothers and make a few improvements on the model, and let it go at that.

AN ABBREVIATED STORY

WORLD—HER HUSBAND

Chapter I.

FOR three days and nights Piedmont Spray was all action, forcefulness and enthusiasm, not to say pep.

The idea had come to him to refurbish his fishing tackle, to make it gleam like new and shine like the deuce, and every spare second and every loose moment he was shining, painting, nickeling, scraping and polishing.

He arose at five in the morning to get in a few extra rubs before breakfast. He hurried home from the office to shine and scrub before supper, and after supper he stayed up scouring and painting till the small hours of the morning.

Chapter II.

"Piedmont," said Mrs. Spray timidly, "I wonder if you'd mind fixing the kitchen shade for me? I'm sure it wouldn't take you more than a minute, or an hour at the most."

Piedmont Spray drew himself up to his full height and expansion, and his eyes blazed with honest indignation.

"I'm a business man—not a carpenter or a mechanic," he withered. "When I come home for peace and quietness, thoroughly exhausted by the day's toil—by what am I greeted? By a soothing and comforting sympathy? No! By a cold-blooded demand that I spend the night hopping on and off kitchen tables. No, madam, by the Lord Harry, no!"

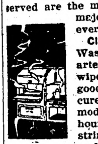
Do the work you have to do
With a purpose strong and true,
Every day.

GOOD THINGS TO EAT

The simplest foods well cooked and served are the most satisfying to the majority of people for every day.



Claridge Beef Heart.—Wash and remove the arteries from the heart, wipe dry and fill with a good stuffing, tie up securely and roast in a moderate oven for three hours. Remove the strings before serving, and also pour a hot gravy around the heart.

Stuffing: Chop one ounce of suet fine, add two cupfuls of bread crumbs, one chopped onion, season with parsley, thyme, pepper, salt, and a grating of nutmeg. Mix well and add one beaten egg to bind it.

Spring Salad.—Grate or put through the fine knife of the food chopper enough carrots to make a cupful, add a little minced celery, a seasoning of onion and enough good salad dressing to season well. Serve on lettuce, dotted with spoonfuls of the dressing.

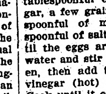
Plain Custard Pie.—It would seem that any cook might make a most acceptable custard pie, but the proof of the pudding being in the eating, we know they can't. Line a pie tin with a good rich crust having the rim stand up well above the edge of the tin. Fill with a custard mixture, using for an ordinary pie two eggs, one-third of a cupful of sugar, a pinch of salt, and two cupfuls of milk, adding a generous grating of nutmeg or cinnamon if preferred. Set into a hot oven to bake the crust quickly—this avoids soaking it—then lower the heat to bake the custard, as that should not be cooked at a high temperature. Too hot an oven will make the custard whey, and become coarse grained. A perfect pie should be well baked on the bottom and have a filling of rich, creamy consistency. A custard is well baked when a knife thrust into the center comes out clean.

Tapioca well cooked and mixed with any bits of canned or fresh fruit, topped with whipped cream, makes a most delightful dessert.

Dumplings.—Delicious fluffy dumplings may be prepared as follows: Take one beaten egg, one cupful of buttermilk, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt; sift in flour enough to make a drop batter. Drop from a teaspoon into a kettle of hot meat with plenty of bones to hold up the dumplings, cover tightly and cook eight minutes. Do not uncover during the cooking.

Everyday Good Things.

If one desires a large quantity of sandwich filling for company, the following recipe will be a good one to follow. For small amounts it may be divided.



Cheese Sandwich Filling.—Mix together one cupful of sour cream, three eggs, one tablespoonful each of butter and sugar, a few grains of cayenne, one teaspoonful of mustard, and one teaspoonful of salt. Beat all together until the eggs are broken, set over hot water and stir until it begins to thicken, then add three tablespoonfuls of vinegar (hot) to the cream mixture. Cook until it coats the spoon, add one and one-half pounds of finely cut cheese, two green peppers put through the meat chopper and two red peppers also chopped. Add the peppers after the mixture is slightly cool. Use on slices of buttered bread. The cheese and peppers may be used, adding enough dressing to make the right consistency; in this way the amount may be varied to suit the need.

Carrot, Pineapple and Nut Salad.—Put a carrot or two through the meat chopper; to one cupful of the carrot add a slice of finely minced pineapple and a tablespoonful of chopped nuts. Mix with a good salad dressing and serve on lettuce.

Curry of Mutton.—Fry one large onion, chopped fine, in two tablespoonfuls of butter. Mix one tablespoonful of curry powder, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of flour, and stir into the onion and butter. Pour over slowly one and one-half cupfuls of stock. Cut two pounds of lean mutton into small pieces and brown them in hot fat; add them to the sauce and simmer until tender. Place the meat on a hot dish and arrange a border of hot cooked rice around it.

Liver Patties.—Scald a pound of liver and grind it with one-fourth of a pound of bacon and an onion through the meat chopper. Season well, form into small cakes and cook in a little hot bacon fat, browning on both sides.

Medley Sandwich.—Take two-thirds of a cupful of minced chicken, one-third of a cupful of minced ham and tongue; add cayenne and enough mayonnaise to make a smooth mixture to spread and spread on buttered brown and white bread made into ribbon sandwiches.

WOMAN COULD NOT SLEEP

Her Mother-in-Law Knew A Remedy

Mrs. Belle Thompson was in a very weak and run-down condition for four years. She had great difficulty in getting to sleep at night and even then did not sleep soundly. She would wake up again and again. Besides this her appetite was poor. "My mother-in-law told me of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Lydia E. Pinkham's Sanative Wash," she writes. "I took six bottles of the Vegetable Compound and I was not the same woman at all. I could sleep and would get up in the morning singing and feeling fine. I am the mother of three children and always after the babies came I had to take treatments, but I can truly say that this last time I have only used the Sanative Wash. It does me more good than the treatments. It keeps me on my feet to care for my children and I do most of my work. I feel it my duty to let you know how both of the medicines have helped me."—MRS. Chapter VI—Continued

It was a splendid night that followed. Perhaps Baree would have slept through it in his nest on the top of the dam if the bacon smell had not stirred the new hunger in him. Since his adventure in the canyon, the deeper forest had held a dread for him, especially at night. But this night was like a pale, golden day: it was moonless; but the stars shone like a billion distant lamps, flooding the world in a soft and billowy sea of light. A gentle whisper of wind made pleasant sounds in the treetops. Beyond that it was very quiet, for it was Puskowepesim—the Moulting Moon—and the wolves were not hunting, the owls had lost their voice, the foxes slunk with the silence of shadows, and even the beavers had begun to cease their labors. The horns of the moose, the deer and the caribou were in tender velvet, and they moved but little and fought not at all. It was late July, Moulting Moon of the Cree, Moon of Silence for the Chippewayan.

In this silence Baree began to hunt. He stirred up a family of half-grown partridges, but they escaped him. He pursued a rabbit that was swifter than he. For an hour he had no luck. Then he heard a sound that made every drop of blood in him thrill. He was close to McTaggart's camp, and what he had heard was a rabbit in one of McTaggart's snares. He came out into a little starlit open and there he saw the rabbit going through a most marvelous pantomime. It amazed him for a moment, and he stopped in his tracks.

Wapoos, the rabbit, had run his furry head into the snare, and his first frightened jump had "shot" the sapling to which the copper wire was attached so that he was now hung half in midair, with only his hind feet touching the ground. And there he was dancing madly while the noose about his neck slowly choked him to death.

Baree gave a sort of gasp. He could understand nothing of the part that the wire and the sapling were playing in this curious game. All he could see was that Wapoos was hopping and dancing about on his hind legs in a most puzzling and unrabbit-like fashion. It may be that he thought it some sort of play. In this instance, however, he did not regard Wapoos as he had looked on Umisk the beaver. He knew that Wapoos made mighty fine eating, and after another moment or two of hesitation he darted upon his prey.

Wapoos, half gone already, made almost no struggle, and in the glow of the stars Baree finished him, and for half an hour afterward he feasted.

McTaggart had heard no sound, for the snare into which Wapoos had run his head was the one set farthest from his camp. Beside the smoldering coals of his fire he sat with his back to a tree, smoking his black pipe and dreaming covetously of Nepeese, when Baree continued his night-wandering. Baree no longer had the desire to hunt. He was too full. But he nosed in and out of the starlit spaces, enjoying immensely the stillness and the golden glow of the night. He was following a rabbit-run when he came to a place where two fallen logs left a trail no wider than his body. He squeezed through; something tightened about his neck; there was a sudden snap—a swish as the sapling was released from its "trigger"—and Baree was jerked off his feet so suddenly that he had no time to conjecture as to what was happening.

The yelp in his throat died in a gurgle, and the next moment he was going through the pantomimic actions of Wapoos, who was having his vengeance inside him. For the life of him Baree could not keep from dancing about, while the wire grew tighter and tighter about his neck. Furiously he struggled. It was a miracle that the fine wire held him. In a few moments more it must have broken—but McTaggart had heard him! The Factor caught up his blanket and a heavy stick, as he hurried toward the snare. It was not a rabbit making those sounds—he knew that. Perhaps a fisher-cat—a lynx, a fox, a young wolf—

It was the wolf he thought of first when he saw Baree at the end of the wire. He dropped the blanket and raised the club. If there had been clouds overhead, or the stars had been less brilliant, Baree would have died as surely as Wapoos had died. With the club raised over his head McTaggart saw in time the white star, the white-tipped ear and the jet black of Baree's coat.

With a swift movement he exchanged the club for the blanket.

In that hour, could McTaggart have looked ahead to the days that were to come, he would have used the club. Could he have foreseen the great tragedy in which Baree was to play a vital part, wrecking his hopes and destroying his world, he would have beaten him to a pulp there under the light of the stars. And Baree, could he have foreseen what was to happen between this brute with a white skin and the most beautiful thing in the forests, would have fought even more bitterly before he surrendered himself to the smothering embrace of the Factor's blanket. On this night Fate had played a strange hand for them both, and only that Fate, and perhaps the stars above, held knowledge of what its outcome was to be.

Half an hour later Bush McTaggart's fire was burning brightly again. In the glow of it Baree lay trussed up like an Indian papoose, tied into a balloon-shaped ball with babiche thong, his head alone showing where his captor had cut a hole for it in the blanket. He was hopelessly caught—so closely imprisoned in the blanket that he could scarcely move a muscle of his body. A few feet away from him McTaggart was bathing a bleeding hand in a basin of water. There was also a red streak down the side of McTaggart's bullish neck.

"You little devil!" he snarled at Baree. "You little devil!"

He reached over suddenly and gave Baree's head a vicious blow with his heavy hand.

"I ought to beat your brains out, and—I believe I will!"

Baree watched him as he picked up a stick close at his side—a bit of firewood. Pierrot had chased him, but this was the first time he had been near enough to the man-monster to see the red glow in his eyes. They were not like the eyes of the wonderful creature who had almost caught him in the web of her hair, and who had crawled after him under the rock. They were beast-eyes. They made him shrink and try to draw his head back into the blanket as the stick was raised. At the same time he snarled. His white fangs gleamed in the firelight. His ears were flat. He wanted to sink his teeth in the red throat, where he had already drawn blood.

The stick fell. It fell again, and when McTaggart was done Baree lay half-stunned, his eyes partly closed by the blows and his mouth bleeding.

"That's the way we take the devil out of a wild dog," snarled McTaggart. "I guess you won't try the biting game again, eh, youngster? A thousand devils—but you went almost to the bone of this hand!"

He began washing the wound again. Baree's teeth had sunk deep, and there was a troubled look in the Factor's face. It was July—a bad month for bites. From his kit he got a small flask of whisky and turned a bit of the raw liquor on the wound, cursing Baree as it burned into his flesh.

Baree's half-shut eyes were fixed on him steadily. He knew that at last he had met the deadliest of all his enemies. And yet he was not afraid. The club in Bush McTaggart's hand had not killed his spirit. It had killed his fear. It had roused in him a hatred such as he had never known—not even when he was fighting Oohoomisew, the outlaw owl. The vengeful animosity of the wolf was burning in him now, along with the savage courage of the dog.

Baree did not take his eyes from McTaggart as he smoked. He watched the man when the latter stretched himself out on the bare ground and went to sleep. He listened, still later, to the man-monster's heinous snoring. Again and again during the long night he struggled to free himself. He would never forget that night. It was terrible. In the thick, hot folds of the blanket his limbs and body were suffocated until the blood almost stood still in his veins. Yet he did not whine.

They began to journey before the sun was up, for if Baree's blood was almost dead within him, Bush McTaggart's was scorching his body with the heat of its anticipation. He made his last plans as he walked swiftly through the forest with Baree under his arm. He would send Pierrot at once for Father Grotin at his Mission seventy miles to the west. He would marry Nepeese—yes, marry her! That would tickle Pierrot. And he would be alone with Nepeese while Pierrot was gone for the missioner.

This thought flamed McTaggart's blood like strong whisky. There was no thought in his hot and unreasoning brain of what Nepeese might say—of what she might think. He was not after the soul of her. His hand clenched, and he laughed harshly as there flashed on him for an instant the thought that perhaps Pierrot would not want to give her up. Pierrot! Bah! It would not be the first time he had killed a man—or the second.

McTaggart laughed again, and he walked still faster. There was no chance of his losing—no chance for Nepeese to get away from him. He—Bush McTaggart—was lord of this wilderness, master of its people, arbiter of their destinies. He was power—and the law.

The sun was well up when Pierrot, standing in front of his cabin with Nepeese, pointed to a rise in the trail three or four hundred yards away, over which McTaggart had just appeared.

"He is coming."

With a face which had aged since last night he looked at Nepeese. Again he saw the dark glow in her eyes and the deepening red of her parted lips, and his heart was sick again with dread. Was it possible—

She turned on him, her eyes shining, her voice trembling.

"Remember, Nootawe—you must send him to me for his answer," she cried quickly, and she darted into the cabin. With a cold, gray face, Pierrot faced Bush McTaggart.

Chapter VII

From the window, her face screened by the folds of the curtain which she had made for it, the Willow saw what happened outside. She was not smiling now. She was breathing quickly, and her body was tense. She heard McTaggart's coarse voice, his boisterous greeting, and then she saw him showing Pierrot what he carried under his arm. There came to her distinctly his explanation of how he had caught his captive in a rabbit-snare. He unwrapped the blanket. Nepeese gave a cry of amazement. In an instant she was out beside them. She did not look at McTaggart's red face, blazing in its joy and exultation.

"It is Baree!" she cried.

She took the bundle from McTaggart and turned to Pierrot.

"Tell him that Baree belongs to me," she said.

She hurried into the cabin. McTaggart looked after her, stunned and amazed. Then he looked at Pierrot. A man half blind could have seen that Pierrot was as amazed as he. Nepeese had not spoken to him—the Factor of Lac Bain! She had not looked at him! And she had taken the dog from him with as little concern as though he had been a wooden man. The red in his face deepened as he stared from Pierrot to the door through which she had gone, and which she had closed behind her.

Great Voices Called Accidents of Nature

Great voices are rare and undoubtedly owe their wonderful purity of tone to an accidental combination of those physical characteristics which lead to the production of song. The human musical instrument, though built of living tissues, resembles in structure the reed organ pipe fitted with a vox humana stop. In both cases the note depends on the vibrations of a column of air produced in the organ by a reed and in the voice by the vocal cords. The human air chamber corresponding to the organ pipe is composed of the larynx and the bronchial system beneath it.

The throat, mouth and nasal cavities form the resonators which, by alternation in shape and size, are able to pick out and emphasize certain component parts of the fundamental tones produced in the larynx. The lungs form the bellows which produce the upward blast of air, and upon their quality depends the loudness of the voice.—London Daily Mail.

Milk Products Old

Butter was known for at least 2,000 years before the Christian era. It was not used as food, however, but mostly as a medicine and ointment, and in some parts was employed as an illuminant for lamps. The butter was churned crudely in skin bags or pouches, and was a very inferior article. Cheese has been known since the earliest times, the oldest mention of it occurring in 1400 B. C. It was used as an article of food before butter

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgagee hereinafter named are authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and payable and they hereby do declare said sum due and payable, which mortgage was executed by Sophie Jefferson and Christ Jefferson, her husband, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated November 15th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 26th day of November, A. D. 1920, at 8 o'clock A. M., in Book 104 of Mortgages, on page 31,

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, joint owners, payable to either or survivor, by written assignment, dated December 17th, A. D. 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, A. D. 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 455:

And whereas, the said Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, the assignees and holders of said mortgage have duly elected and do hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2,000.00), with accumulated interest from the 15th day of November, 1923, at the rate of six and one-half per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof;

NOW THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz:

Lots Six, Seven, Ten and Eleven (6, 7, 10 & 11), of Section Three (3), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty-two (42) West of the 5th P. M., containing one hundred sixty-two and 48-100 acres, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota.

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the Front door of the County Court House, at Warren, in said County and State on the 1st day of June, 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Seventy-five Dollars attorneys fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

Dated April 12th, 1926.

MARY O'MALLEY and NELLIE O'MALLEY,
Assignees of Mortgagee.

W. J. SMITH,
Attorney for Assignees of Mortgagee,

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of Two Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 ($292.50) Dollars, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice, upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by W. W. Prichard, Sr., and Anita R. Prichard, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, bearing date the 27th day of March, 1922, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, 1922, at 1 o'clock P. M. in Book 103 of Mortgages, on page 298:

Which said Mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment dated the 30th day of July, 1923, and recorded in the office of said Register of Deeds, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages on page 461:

AND WHEREAS, The said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the Assignee and Holder of said Mortgage has duly elected and does hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said Mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said Mortgage and the power of sale therein contained; and whereas there is actually due and claimed to be due and payable at the date of this notice the sum of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 Dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of 6½ per cent per annum from the 3rd day of April, 1926, and whereas the said power of sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage, or any part thereof;

Now, Therefore, Notice is Hereby Given, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The South Half of the Southeast quarter of Section Number Twenty-nine (29), the Southwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter of Section Number Twenty-eight (28), and the West Half of the Northwest Quarter of Section Number Thirty-three (33), in Township Number One Hundred Fifty-five (155), North of Range Number Forty-four (44), West of the Principal Meridian, containing according to the United States Government Survey thereof, two hundred (200) acres be the same more or less, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren in said County and State, on the 19th day of June 1926, at 2 o'clock P. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 Dollars, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and Seventy-five and No-100 Dollars, Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the date of sale, as provided by law.

LIVES ON FARM IN OKLAHOMA

Happy Woman Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

In a sunny pasture in Oklahoma, a herd of sleek cows was grazing. They made a pretty picture. But the thin woman in the blue checked apron sighed as she looked at them. She was tired of cows, tired of her tedious work in the dairy. She was tired of cooking for a houseful of boarders, besides caring for her own family. The burdens of life seemed too heavy for her failing health. She had lost confidence in herself.

One day she began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and her general health began to improve. She took it faithfully. Now she can do her work without any trouble, sleeps well and is no longer blue and timid.

This woman, Mrs. Cora Short, R. R. 9, Box 396, Oklahoma City, Okla., writes: "Everybody now says: 'Mrs. Short, what are you doing to yourself?' I weigh 135 and my weight before I took it was 115. I have taken seven bottles of the Vegetable Compound."

Other women who have to work hard and keep things going may find the road to better health as Mrs. Short did, through the faithful use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Misjudged

The Marquis Henri de la Falaise, Gloria Swanson's husband, has opened a bookshop in New York. His popularity has increased in consequence.

M. de la Falaise, discussing this increase in popularity, said the other day:

"When a titled foreigner marries an American girl with money the worst motives are imputed to him. It's like the little story.

"'Sir,' a young baron said to a Broadway banker, 'I have called to ask if you will give assent to my marriage—'

"'Not a cent!' roared the banker. 'Not a cent! Boy, show this young man out!'" — Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

Tired, Lame, Achy?

Are you dragging around with a constant backache? Feel weak, worn and achy; so miserable you can't enjoy a moment's comfort? How about your kidneys? Well kidneys filter off body poisons. But when the kidneys slow up, poisons accumulate and upset the system. Backache is apt to follow, with sharp pains, dizziness and annoying kidney irregularities. Don't delay! If you suspect faulty kidney action, use Doan's Pills. Doan's have helped thousands—are recommended the world over. Ask your neighbor!

BEAUTY AND EXPLORER

TRUEDALE ROVER, the famous explorer, traveler and hunter, never failed to dazzle and awe the young women who had the honor to be introduced to him at the social gatherings at which he was in such great demand. So now, sitting behind a potted palm with beautiful young Magazine Ootle at Mrs. Piggyback's reception, he prepared for an easy conquest as he launched into a description of the China sea snootfish, which climbs aboard ships and bites sailors in half.

"Yes," she nodded brightly. "I've seen them. Aren't they exciting? But the sea oxen off the coast of Labrador are much more dangerous, because they hunt in flocks and butt holes into boats with their heads. Have you seen them?"

"Eer—no," admitted Rover. "Now, the flying weasel of southern Zanzibar is a curious animal. It flies revolving with its tail in its mouth, for great distances, and yet never has been known to grow dizzy."

"Oh, yes, I've seen them often," replied Magazine brightly. "But I prefer to watch the Hellespont camels of central Hindustan. They walk backwards, you know, on their front legs, yet never bump into a thing, somehow. You've seen them, of course?"

"Well—er—no," said Rover, reluctantly. "I must tell you of the Bulgarian goulash bug, which sings like a mouth organ and drinks through a straw. When I first—"

"Oh, yes!" she interrupted. "I've watched them often. Have you ever seen the Patagonian plumdog, which—"

"Stop!" cried Truesdale Rover hoarsely. "How on earth did you, at your age, get to see all of these things in all these places?"

But Rover had staggered off to 'phone in his resignation to the Geographical society.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT

By F. A. WALKER

CO-OPERATION

IT IS remarked by observing students of cause and effect that, in all activities of minds and hands, we as a people are decidedly delinquent in co-operation.

In other words, instead of working together as a whole, we are at odds, leaving off the mystery of today's perplexities until tomorrow and likely as not forgetting them, or putting them off altogether in pursuit of outside activities of an alien nature.

In the office and in the home, if you will look about you with impartial eyes, you will not be long in discovering that there is frequent lack of co-operative forces, due not so much to the individual workers, but to the inefficiency of those whose duty it is to direct, encourage and spur up workers to do their best and keep in touch and tune with others.

In great office buildings, or in factories where large numbers of both sexes are employed, there are efforts made to bring about the full co-operation of forces—a work filled with difficulties, calling every hour for rare patience and diplomacy.

If examined critically these efforts will be found meager as compared with what might be done if co-operation of forces should be organized and directed by competent captains.

While results in the last decade have improved, they are far from being wholly satisfactory.

There still is much waste of energy and loss of time without any apparent curtailment of expense to the anxious, hard-working manufacturers, merchants and employers generally who provide the money for pay days, irrespective of the state of business.

The care-worn housewives have similar experiences, and meet like conditions simply because of a laxity in organization and the co-operation of forces.

For all deficiencies, whether mental or physical, we must in some way or another pay the penalties imposed by cause and effect upon all mankind.

The thing to do to avoid these oft-repeated impositions is to bring about a more effective means in the co-operation of forces, not only in the home and the factory, but in every department of the state and the nation.

Not until this shall be done can we escape burdensome taxes or hope for reduced prices in anything that goes upon our backs, into our homes and upon our tables.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"ALL FOR A SONG"

"HE HAS sold his future for a song," they said of a rich man's son who, instead of taking advantage of the unusual opportunities open to him for a worth-while career, was whiling away his golden years on the Great White Way.

"All for a song" has come to mean to us "paying too much for a whistle," any undue sacrifice or waste for something that is worthless or only of transient moment, particularly the superficial. It has come down to us from the day when its significance was literal.

Queen Elizabeth, as a token of her appreciation of the poet, Edmund Spencer, had ordered Lord Burleigh to present him with £100, which in those days was a small fortune. Upon this Lord Burleigh is said to have exclaimed: "All this for a song!"

WHO WOULD HAVE GOLD?

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

Who would have gold? It isn't hard to gain:
Go plant the seed, the Lord will send the rain
And fill the fertile fields with yellow grain.

Who gold desires? Then sow the rolling hill,
Or plant a little garden, if you will,
Or put a box upon a window-sill.

And plant a bulb, or give a root a hold,
And then some day observe a flow'r unfold.
It isn't hard to gain—who would have gold?

The summer sun will ripen all your wheat,
A yellow rose will make your garden sweet,
A yellow jonquil cheer your window-seat.

Upon your path the summer's petals fall,
And autumn's yellow leaves adorn the wall.
Who would have gold? It isn't hard at all!

Mother's Cook Book

Die when I will, I want it said of me, by those who knew me best, that I always plucked a thistle and planted a flower where I thought a flower would grow.

CHEESE AS FOOD

CHEESE is one of our most valuable protein foods; is concentrated and has very little waste. When the price is high compare it with meat, one of the other proteins which we all like, and notice the difference in waste.

Cheese Omelet.

Beat two egg yolks until thick, add two tablespoonfuls of water, salt and pepper to taste. Beat the whites until stiff and add one cupful of grated cheese. Put a tablespoonful of butter in a hot, smooth frying pan; when hot pour in the lightly mixed omelet. Cook until well set, place in the oven to finish cooking on the top. Serve at once on a hot platter.

Welsh Rarebit.

Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter, add two tablespoonfuls of flour, and when well blended add one cupful of hot milk; cook until smooth and creamy. Add one cupful of grated cheese and when the cheese is melted serve on buttered toast or hot crackers. To make the dish a little more tasty add half a dozen chopped olives.

Cheese Fondu.

Pour one cupful of scalded milk over one cupful of soft bread crumbs, add three-fourths of a cupful of soft cheese cut into bits, one tablespoonful of butter, and salt and pepper to taste. Beat five egg yolks until thick, add to the cheese mixture and fold in the stiffly beaten whites. Bake in a well-greased dish for twenty minutes or until puffy and cooked to the center.

Cheese and Celery Salad.

Select firm, crisp, tender celery and choose the stalks which have deep grooves. Cut into inch pieces and fill with seasoned cream cheese to which chopped onion, green pepper and nuts have been added. Heap a half dozen of these filled stalks on lettuce and serve with a French dressing.

This same method may be used for longer stalks and serve them as a salad accompaniment.

Hot Ham and Tomato Sandwiches.

Saute thin slices of lean ham very quickly in a frying pan. Peel and slice thin some ripe tomatoes. Have ready slices of white bread cut one-fourth inch thick and lightly toasted. Spread toast with salad dressing, cover with ham, then a slice of tomato and spread with salad dressing and chopped lettuce leaves. Cover with toast spread on one side with salad dressing. Cut into triangles and garnish with sliced pickle. Serve with coffee.

Baked Mackerel.

If salt soak over night, skin side up, changing the water several times. Put to bake skin-side down, adding a few teaspoonfuls of water. Cook 20 minutes, or until the fish loosens from the bones. After ten minutes cover with sweet cream and baste often during the baking. Serve with sauce poured over the fish.

How Land Is Used

The use of land in the United States for all purposes is as follows: Fourteen per cent crops for feed, 3 per cent humid improved pasture, 9 per cent humid unimproved pasture, 31 per cent arid and semi-arid pasture and grazing land, 12 per cent forest cut-over and burned-over land pasture, 13 per cent forest cut-over and burned-over land not pasture, 12 per cent roads, railroads, cities, farmsteads and other land not in pasture, 2 per cent crops for fiber, 4 per cent crops for food.

MINNESOTA NEWS

St. Paul—The senate passed a house bill authorizing the secretary of agriculture to acquire and maintain dams in the Superior national forest of Minnesota for the conservation of land and timber.

Fergus Falls—Dynamite in a pail he was carrying exploded, hurling Rudolph Marvic of Dent, 23 years old, 50 feet. He was dead when picked up. Marvic was helping to blast stumps on his father's farm.

Minneapolis—Two drownings within 300 feet of each other, one a Minneapolis real estate man, and the other a University of Minnesota medical student, marked the first lake fatalities of the city's 1926 outing season.

Duluth—Horace Johnson, vice president of the Duluth & Iron Range railroad and veteran employe of the road since 1888, was elected president and general manager to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Francis E. House.

Duluth—Leonidas J. Merrit, 82 years old, discoverer of the first iron ore on the Mesaba range, mining genius, railroad builder, civic leader, and the oldest Duluthian in point of residence, died at his home here, following a heart attack.

Owatonna—Steele county's biggest single manufacturing industry brought more than $2,000,000 into the county during 1925, a survey indicates. It is the butter manufacturing industry, and during the past year farmers who operate it received from outside of the county and from home consumption of the principal product manufactured—butter—just $2,774,785.14.

Mankato—Asa C. Barney, 90 years old, who came here 69 years ago as the Indians went on the warpath to rid the country of white settlers, lies in the soil that he helped wrest from the natives. He died after a brief illness and was buried in a cemetery once part of the Indians' undisputed domains.

St. Paul—Ray P. Chase, state auditor, filed as a candidate for renomination to that office. Mr. Chase was appointed a clerk in the auditor's office in 1916 and was later appointed deputy auditor by Governor Preus, who was auditor at that time. In January, 1921, he was appointed state auditor and the following year he was elected to the office.

New Ulm—Tom Davis, candidate for the farmer-labor nomination for governor, opened his campaign here with an address outlining his campaign platform. The meeting also rallied a number of his supporters in this section of the state. Dr. L. A. Fritsche, who was one of Mr. Davis' opponents in the primary contest two years ago, presided and introduced the candidate.

International Falls—Eight hundred men joined with two city fire departments in fighting a blaze which destroyed an entire residence block here. Low water pressure in city hydrants prevented a successful check of the blaze until after it had destroyed nine dwellings, several garages and barns and forced the removal of patients from Craig hospital which caught fire.

Minnesota Lake—Efforts are under way to make a permanent memorial here of an old Dutch windmill, believed to be the only one of its kind in the United States. The mill, erected in 1868, according to Probate Judge J. W. Vance of Blue Earth, was built by Gottlieb Schostag, who was born in Holland in 1834. For many years, the mill ground flour and feed for the pioneers of this region.

Minneapolis—For the first time in many years former Governor Samuel R. Van Sant missed his annual walk to the old state capitol as a part of the joint celebration of his birthday and that of the state. Mr. Van Sant said that friends and relatives had dissuaded him from the attempt, although he himself feels confident that it would have had no ill effects. He was 82 years old Tuesday and the state 68.

Le Sueur — An economic school board at Medina, Ohio, decided 50 years ago that it couldn't afford to give a diploma to the one lone graduate of the class. Sharply disappointed, Miss Erva Goodwin, the sole member of the class, decided to make the best of it. This week, Mrs. William Snow, formerly Miss Goodwin, received a letter stating that the school board of Medina was forwarding her the long delayed diploma.

Minneapolis—The first general rain since seeding was well started watered fields of the northwest while overcast skies in many sections gave promise of further rainfall. Everywhere, cities and country alike, rejoiced in showers, however light, as breaking the long drouth. The general rain came just in time, and "is the finest thing in the world" for Minnesota, Paul H. Kirk, state agricultural statistician said.

Arlington—Forty years of continuous service have won for Hugh McGovern, chief of police here, father of Johnny McGovern, famous Minnesota football star, congratulations from all sections of the northwest.

St. Paul—Judge Jacques, of Duluth, has filed as a candidate for governor of Minnesota on the democratic ticket. Judge Jaques is former United States district attorney and has been active in democratic politics in the state since 1892.

Minneapolis — Minnesota farmers have planted no more winter wheat than they did last year, but will get 181,000 more bushels from their work if the condition of the crop on May 1 holds until harvest, Paul H. Kirk, state agricultural statistician, said in his May crop report.

Airships and Great Guns

According to the occassionally reliable Moscow newspapers, the United States has the greatest military aviation service in the world. Russian newspapers now describe two American dirigibles, each mounting 20 cannon. The United States also has 14,000 military airplanes, according to the information on which the Russian commissar of war and navy bases his comparison to show the needs of the Soviet union. Though giant dirigibles capable of mounting 20 machine guns have not progressed beyond the drawing-board stage in the navy department designers' office, they have become an actuality in Russian newspapers that have printed pictures of them, cannons and all. Chapter VII—Continued

—12—

On the floor of the cabin Nepeese dropped on her knees and finished unwrapping the blanket. She was not afraid of Baree. She had forgotten McTaggart. And then, as Baree rolled in a limp heap on the floor, she saw his half-closed eyes and the dry blood on his jaws, and the light left her face as swiftly as the sun is shadowed by a cloud.

"Baree," she cried softly. "Baree—Baree!"

The voice of the Willow thrilled Baree. It seemed to stir the sluggish blood in his veins, and he opened his eyes wider and saw again the wonderful stars that had glowed at him so softly the day of Wakayooo's death. One of the Willow's long braids fell over her shoulder, and he smelled again the sweet scent of her hair as her hand caressed him and her voice talked to him. Then she got up suddenly and left him, and he did not move while he waited for her. In a moment she was back with a basin of water and a cloth. Gently she washed the blood from his eyes and mouth. And still Baree made no move. He scarcely breathed. But Nepeese saw the little quivers that shot through his body when her hand touched him, like electric shocks.

"He beat you with a club," she was saying, her dark eyes within a foot of Baree's. "He beat you! That man-beast!"

There came an interruption. The door opened, and the man-beast stood looking down on them, a grin on his red face. Instantly Baree showed that he was alive. He sprang back from under the Willow's hand with a sudden snarl and faced McTaggart. The hair of his spine stood up like a brush; his fangs gleamed menacingly.

"There is a devil in him," said McTaggart. "He is wild—born of the wolf. You must be careful or he will take off a hand, ka sakahet!" It was the first time he had called her that lover's name in Cree—sweetheart! Her heart pounded. She bent her head for a moment over her clenched hands, and McTaggart—looking down on what he thought was her confusion—laid his hand caressingly on her hair. From the door Pierrot had heard the word, and now he saw the caress, and he raised a hand as if to shut out the sight of a sacrilege.

"Mon Dieu!" he breathed.

In the next instant he had given a sharp cry of wonder that mingled with a sudden yell of pain from McTaggart. Like a flash Baree had darted across the floor and fastened his teeth in the Factor's leg. They had bitten deep before McTaggart freed himself with a powerful kick. With an oath he snatched his revolver from its holster. The Willow was ahead of him. With a little cry she darted to Baree and caught him in her arms. As she looked up at McTaggart, her soft, bare throat was within a few inches of Baree's naked fangs. Her eyes blazed.

"You beat him!" she cried. "He hates you—hates you—"

"Let him go!" called Pierrot in an agony of fear. "Mon Dieu! I say let him go or he will tear the life from you!"

"He hates you—hates you—hates you—" the Willow was repeating over and over again into McTaggart's startled face. Then suddenly she turned to her father. "No, he will not tear the life from me," she cried. "See! It is Baree. Did I not tell you that? It is Baree! Is it not proof that he defended me—"

"From me!" gasped McTaggart, his face darkening.

Pierrot advanced and laid a hand on McTaggart's arm. He was smiling.

"Let us leave them to fight it out between themselves, m'sieu," he said. "They are two little firebrands, and we are not safe. If she is bitten—"

He shrugged his shoulders. A great load had been lifted from them suddenly. His voice was soft and persuasive. And now the anger had gone out of the Willow's face. A coquettish uplift of her eyes caught McTaggart, and she looked straight at him, half smiling, as she spoke to her father:

"I will join you soon, mon pere—you and M'sieu the Factor from Lac Bain!"

There were undeniable little devils in her eyes, McTaggart thought—little devils laughing full at him as she spoke, setting his brain afire and his blood to running wildly. Those eyes—full of dancing witches! How he would tame them and play with them—very soon now. He followed Pierrot outside. In his exultation he no longer felt the smart of Baree's teeth.

"I will show you my new cariole that I have made for winter, m'sieu," said Pierrot as the door closed behind them.

* * * * * * *

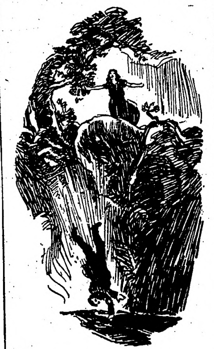
Half an hour later Nepeese came out of the cabin. McTaggart's jaws were set, but his eyes flared up with pleasure when he saw her. She knew what it was about. The Factor from Lac Bain had been demanding his answer of Pierrot, and Pierrot had been telling him what she had insisted upon—that he must come to her. And he was coming! She turned with a quick beating of the heart and hurried down a little path. She heard McTaggart's footsteps behind her, and threw the flash of a smile over her shoulder. But her teeth were set tight. The nails of her fingers were cutting into the palms of her hands.

Pierrot stood without moving. He watched them as they disappeared into the edge of the forest, Nepeese still ahead of McTaggart. Out of his breast rose a sharp breath.

"Par les mille cornes du diable!" he swore softly. "Is it possible—that she smiles from her heart at that beast? Non! It is impossible. And yet—if it is so—"

One of his brown hands tightened convulsively about the handle of the knife in his belt, and slowly he began to follow them.

McTaggart did not hurry to overtake Nepeese. She was following the narrow path deeper into the forest, and he was glad of that. They would be alone—away from Pierrot. He was satisfied to let her go on. When she turned from the narrow trail into a side path that scarcely bore the mark of travel, his heart gave an exultant jump. If she kept on, he would very soon have her alone—a good distance from the cabin. The blood ran hot in his face. He did not speak to her, through fear that she would stop. Ahead of them he heard the rumble of water. It was the creek running through the chasm.



"Bete Noir! Bete Noir!"

Nepeese was making straight for that sound. With a little laugh she started to run, and when she stood at the edge of the chasm, McTaggart was fully fifty yards behind her. Twenty feet sheer down there was a deep pool between the rock walls, a pool so deep that it was like blue ink. She turned to face the Factor from Lac Bain. He had never looked more like a red beast to her. Until this moment she had been unafraid. But now—in an instant—he terrified her. Before she could speak what she had planned to say, he was at her side, and had taken her face between his two great hands, his coarse fingers twining in the silken strands of her thick braids where they fell over her shoulders at the neck.

"Ka sakahet!" he cried passionately. "Pierrot said you would have an answer for me. But I need no answer now. You are mine! Mine!"

She gave a cry. It was a gasping, broken cry. His arms were about her like bands of iron, crushing her slender body, shutting off her breath, turning the world almost black for her. She could neither struggle nor cry out. She felt the hot passion of his lips on her face, heard his voice—and then came a moment's freedom, and air into her strangled lungs. Pierrot was calling! He had come to the fork in the trail, and he was calling the Willow's name!

McTaggart's hot hand came over her mouth.

"Don't answer," she heard him say.

Strength—anger—hatred flared up in her, and fiercely she struck the hand down. Something in her wonderful eyes held McTaggart. They blazed into his very soul.

"Bete noir!" she panted at him, freeing herself from the last touch of his hands. "Beast—black beast!" Her voice trembled, and her face flamed. "See—I came to show you my pool—and tell you what you wanted to hear—and you—you—have crushed me like a beast—like a great rock— See! down there—it is my pool!"

She had not planned it like this. She had intended to be smiling, even laughing, in this moment. But McTaggart had spoiled them—her carefully made plans! And yet, as she pointed, the Factor from Lac Bain looked for an instant over the edge of the chasm. And then she laughed as she gave him a sudden shove from behind.

"And that is my answer, M'sieu le Facteur from Lac Bain!" she cried tauntingly as he plunged headlong into the deep pool between the rock walls.

From the edge of the open Pierrot saw what had happened, and he gave a great gasp. He drew back among the balsams. This was not a moment for him to show himself. While his heart drummed like a hammer, his face was filled with joy.

On her hands and knees the Willow was peering over the edge. Bush McTaggart had disappeared. He had gone down like the great clod he was; the water of her pool had closed over him with a dull splash that was like a chuckle of triumph. He appeared now, beating out with his arms and legs to keep himself afloat, while the Willow's voice came to him in taunting cries.

"Bete noir! Bete noir! Beast! Beast—"

She flung small sticks and tufts of earth down at him fiercely; and McTaggart, looking up as he gained his equilibrium, saw her leaning so far over that she seemed about to fall. Her long braids hung down into the chasm, gleaming in the sun; her eyes were laughing while her lips taunted him; he could see the flash of her white teeth.

"Beast! Beast!"

He began swimming, still looking up at her. It was a hundred yards down the slow-going current to the beach of shale where he could climb out, and a half of that distance she followed him, laughing and taunting him, and flinging down sticks and pebbles. He noted that none of the sticks or stones was large enough to hurt him. When at last his feet touched bottom, she was gone.

Swiftly Nepeese ran back over the trail, and almost into Pierrot's arms. She was panting and laughing, when for a moment she stopped.

"I have given him the answer, Nootawe! He is in the pool!"

Into the balsams she disappeared like a bird. Pierrot made no effort to stop her or to follow.

"Tonnerre de Dieu!" he chuckled—and cut straight across for the other trail.

Nepeese was out of breath when she reached the cabin. Baree, fastened to a table-leg by a babiche thong, heard her pause for a moment at the door. Then she entered and came straight to him. During the half-hour of her absence Baree had scarcely moved. That half-hour, and the few minutes that had preceded it, had made tremendous impressions upon him. Nature, heredity, and instinct were at work, clashing and readjusting, impinging on him a new intelligence—the beginning of a new understanding. A swift and savage impulse had made him leap at Bush McTaggart when the Factor put his hand on the Willow's head. It was not reason. It was the dog—and woman.

And here again it was the woman. She had called to the great hidden passion that was in Baree and that had come to him from Kazan. Of all the living things in the world, he knew that he must not hurt this creature that appeared to him through the door. He trembled as she knelt before him again, and up through the years came the wild and glorious surge of Kazan's blood, overwhelming the wolf, submerging the savagery of his birth—and with his head flat on the floor he whined softly, and wagged his tail.

Nepeese gave a cry of joy.

Small Insects Not Named by Scientists

Some tiny insects are never seen except in winter and so little known that they have no popular name. Scientists call them Borcus, and they leap on the snow like miniature black grasshoppers. What they eat and how they live has not yet been discovered.

The crane flies, better known, perhaps, as "daddy longlegs," with their narrow wings and dangling, awkward legs, are strictly summer insects. But they have a small and poor relation without any wings at all and only moderately long legs, which enjoys itself in the very coldest kind of winter weather and goes a-wooing across the snow with the thermometer below zero.

By far the largest number of snow insects belong to an insect division familiarly known as "springtails." Some 900 different kinds of springtails have been recorded. They are found all over the globe from the Arctic to the Antarctic.—Nature Magazine.

Wonders of World

The seven wonders of the ancient world were the pyramids of Egypt, the hanging gardens of Babylon, the temple of Diana at Ephesus, the statue of Jupiter in Greece, the tomb of Mausolus at Halicarnassus, the pharos at Alexander and the colossus of Rhodes.

If you want to buy a car on time

IT is to your advantage to buy the car that you can comfortably afford, on a payment plan that gives you a sure margin of safety.

General Motors has its own finance company, the General Motors Acceptance Corporation, operating the GMAC Plan. Through its service more than 1,000,000 families have purchased cars comfortably out of income.

On August 1 last, the price of this service, which had always been low, was further reduced. And the automobile-buying public is now saving millions of dollars annually as a result of this reduction and the influence of General Motors' leadership.

The purchase of automobiles on time is a universally accepted practice. The car is a utility and it is sound business to conserve capital and use credit. But buy on sound terms and at low rates. Any General Motors dealer will explain the advantages of the GMAC Plan.

Father Now Cast for Untried Role

If the plans of a group of English clubwomen, some thousands strong, go through, father will spend his evenings beside the mending basket and the undarned sock. He will wash up the supper dishes, tidy up the parlor and scrub up the front steps.

Friend husband, in short, will do his share of the housework. He will sweep, dust, cook, wash and on Mother's evenings out (which will be more frequent than formerly) he will take care of the children.

Mother calls attention to the fact that she, too, has had a full day while father was at the office, and that any knickknacks or chores which happen to be left over when supper is done are to be shared henceforth on a 50-50 basis.

Detroit women agree that the 50-50 basis would be a fine adjustment, and many think that the boy should be trained for housekeeping as well as the girl. There is a long road to travel before this happens, however, according to Frank Cody, superintendent of Detroit schools.

NOTICE OF MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage containing a Power of Sale, by reason of which default said Power of Sale has become operative, and the Assignee of the Mortgagee hereinafter named are authorized to declare the whole sum of said mortgage due and payable and they hereby do declare said sum due and payable, which mortgage was executed by Sophie Jefferson and Christ Jefferson, her husband, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, dated November 15th, 1920 and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minneosta, on the 26th day of November, A. D. 1920, at 8 o'clock A. M., in Book 104 of Mortgages, on page 31,

Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, joint owners, payable to either or survivor, by written assignment, dated December 17th, A. D. 1920, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Marshall County, Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, A. D. 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages, on page 455;

And whereas, the said Mary O'Malley and Nellie O'Malley, the assignees and holders of said mortgage have duly elected and do hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice under the terms and conditions of said mortgage and the Power of Sale therein contained; and whereas, there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2,000.00), with accumulated interest from the 15th day of November, 1923, at the rate of six and one-half per cent per annum; and whereas, the said Power of Sale has become operative and no action or proceedings having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof;

NOW THEREFORE, Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the Power of Sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and covered by said mortgage, viz:

Lots Six, Seven, Ten and Eleven (6, 7, 10 & 11), of Section Three (3), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty-two (42) West of the 5th P. M., containing one hundred sixty-two and 8-100 acres, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota.

Which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the Front door of the County Court House, at Warren, in said County and State on the 1st day of June, 1926, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the amount then due on said mortgage and interest, together with the costs and disbursements of such sale and Seventy-five Dollars attorneys fees stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

Dated April 12th, 1926.

MARY O'MALLEY and NELLIE O'MALLEY,
Assignees of Mortgagee.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE.

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of Two Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 ($292.50) Dollars, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice, upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by W. W. Prichard, Sr., and Anita R. Prichard, his wife, Mortgagors, to Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, bearing date the 27th day of March, 1922, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 30th day of March, 1922, at 1 o'clock P. M. in Book 103 of Mortgages, on page 298;

Which said Mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Deposit Trust and Savings Bank, Winona, Minnesota, Mortgagee, to Deposit Bank and Trust Company, by written assignment dated the 30th day of July, 1923, and recorded in the office of said Register of Deeds, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 11 o'clock A. M., in Book 110 of Mortgages on page 461;

AND WHEREAS, The said Deposit Bank and Trust Company, the Assignee and Holder of said Mortgage has duly elected and does hereby elect to declare the whole principal sum of said Mortgage due and payable at the date of this notice, under the terms and conditions of said Mortgage and the power of sale therein contained; and whereas there is actually due and claimed to be due and payable at the date of this notice the sum of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 Dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of 6½ per cent per annum from the 3rd day of April, 1926, and whereas the said power of sale has become operative, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage, or any part thereof;

Now, Therefore, Notice is Hereby Given, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The South Half of the Southeast quarter of Section Number Twenty-nine (29), the Southwest Quarter of the Southwest Quarter of Section Number Twenty-eight (28), and the West Half of the Northwest Quarter of Section Number Thirty-three (33), in Township Number One Hundred Fifty-five (155), North of Range Number Forty-four (44), West of the Principal Meridian, containing according to the United States Government Survey thereof, two hundred (200) acres be the same more or less,

In Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Marshall County, at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren in said County and State, on the 19th day of June 1926, at 2 o'clock P. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 50-100 Dollars, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and Seventy-five and No-100 Dollars, Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the date of sale, as provided by law.

LEST WE FORGET

As we cross the threshold of the beautiful month of May, we can but halt a moment in silent honor of those who gave their all that we might prosper and live in a world of happiness and peace. Their "day" comes in May. A single day out of a year of length yet more hearts, and minds, and love, will surrender on Decoration day than on any other of the year.

No honor is too great for those who laid down their lives in the wars of our nation, since its birth. May Decoration Day, this year, serve to tender the resting places of our great, and ease many heavy hearts.

Atty. Ira H. Burhans, candidate for county attorney, came to Stephen in January 1918, to take over P. A. McClerman's law practice, and has actively engaged in the practice of law there since that time, except for 18 months service as a buck private in the army with the 55th Engineers, A. E. F., with whom he served a year in France. Since his return he has been active in Legion affairs, being twice commander of the local post. He is a Republican by party affiliation.

Before coming to Stephen he worked for County Attorney W. A. Blanchard, of Anoka County, gaining practical legal experience. His legal education was obtained at the University of Minnesota, 1914-1917, and he was admitted to the bar in 1917 He is 35 years old, born at Superior, Wisconsin, a son of Ira W. Burhans, a lawyer of Holland ~~Dutch extraction, and Helen~~ Louise Hatch, of New Hampshire Yankee blood. He comes of a family of lawyers, his maternal grandfather being also a lawyer. In 1917 he married Millie Christine Newhouse, of Minneapolis, Minn., of Norwegian extraction, and four children bless his home, two boys and two girls. His early life was spent in Superior where he graduated from high school and worked in a law office.

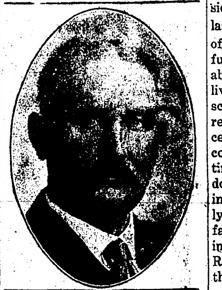
GUNDER P. SORTER BOOSTED

ANNOUNCEMENT
[Paid Advertisement]



Justice Carlson

To the voters of Marshall County:

I hereby announce that I am a candidate for the office of Sheriff at the Primary Election to be held on June 21st, and your vote and support will be appreciated.

If nominated and elected I promise to devote all my time and effort to the performance of the duties of the office, to the best of my ability.

Have been Deputy Sheriff of this County several years and believe I am capable of performing all the duties of the office which I now seek.

Yours very truly,
Justice Carlson.

Pike and Pickerel Season Opened Sat.; Catch Limited

Numerous inquiries have been made relative to the opening ~~date of the hook and line fishing~~ season in this part of the state, especially the pike season.

The fishing season is open now for brook trout and has been since April 15. The season on wall-eyed pike, pickerel and perch opened May 15 and the season on black bass, sunfish, crappies, rock bass, etc, opens on June 21.

The pike season this year opened on Saturday. Muskellunge may also be taken now, as may sand pike or saugers. The state laws provide that a fisherman may fish with only one line and that not over eight pike, 15 pickerel or perch or not over 15 of these three varieties mixed may be taken in one day. In is well to remeber the law on wall-eyed pike and to keep within the legal limit of the number of these excellent fish which may be taken. Game wardens thruout the state have been instructed to pay full attention to catches this season and it is much better to observe the law than to be taken before a judge or justice of the peace.

(Crowded out last week.)

Notice!

A Holstien bull calf came to my place about a week ago, and the owner can have same by proving property and paying for this notice. C. O. Johnson
Ramaley Farm.

There are now six candidates in the field for County Commissioner in the Fifth district. The last to file was Gunder P. Sorter of Holt. Mr. Sorter is a successful and prosperous farmer living about six miles east of Holt, has lived in that section more than a score of years and is very highly respected. He has made a success of his own business, has the confidence and respect of the entire community, and if a man can do that with his own affairs during the past crisis, he is certainly capable to handle public affairs successfully. The following was taken from the Warren Register shows his standing in that part of this county:

"Gunder P. Sorter was in from Holt last week and filed for county commissioner from the fifth district. Mr. Sorter is a prominent farmer and has long taken an active part in public affairs. He is the fifth entry from this district. Up to date there are two from the town of Rollis, one from Whiteford, one from Esplee aud one from Holt, Is is possible that there will also be one from the town of Mud Lake. With that many in the field there should be an interesting contest in that district at the primaries."——Grygla Eagle.

LIVES ON FARM IN OKLAHOMA

Happy Woman Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

In a sunny pasture in Oklahoma, a herd of sleek cows was grazing. They made a pretty picture. But the thin woman in the blue checked apron sighed as she looked at them. She was tired of cows, tired of her tedious work in the dairy. She was tired of cooking for a houseful of boarders, besides caring for her own family. The burdens of life seemed too heavy for her failing health. She had lost confidence in herself.

One day she began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and her general health began to improve. She took it faithfully. Now she can do her work without any trouble, sleeps well and is no longer blue and timid.

This woman, Mrs. Cora Short, R. R. 6, Box 396, Oklahoma City, Okla., writes: "Everybody now says: 'Mrs. Short, what are you doing to yourself?' I weigh 135 and my weight before I took it was 115. I have taken seven bottles of the Vegetable Compound."

Other women who have to work hard and keep things going may find the road to better health as Mrs. Short did, through the faithful use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

The TALE of KIDDIE KATYDID

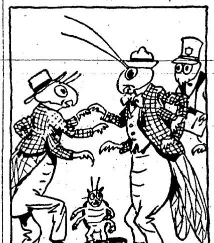
By Arthur Scott Bailey

A QUARREL

KIDDIE KATYDID and Leaper the Locust quarreled so loudly over a message marked "For Mr. Grasshopper" that they soon drew a crowd around them.

"That message for 'Mr. Grasshopper' is certainly meant for me," Kiddie insisted. "You know yourself how you have objected to being called by the name of 'Grasshopper.' Why, only last night you refused to stop when Freddie Firefly shouted it after you."

"And you—" cried Leaper the Locust—"you paid no attention when Chirpy Cricket went up to you just as the moon rose this evening and said, 'How-dy do, Mr. Grasshopper!' right in your ear. You have no right to open the message. And I promise you that I shall make trouble for you if you don't mind your own affairs."



"I Promise You That I Shall Make Trouble for You."

"Well, well—what's all this row about, anyhow?" asked a strange voice. It was a newcomer in Pleasant Valley who had just spoken. He elbowed his way briskly through the throng until he reached the center of it, where Kiddie and Leaper the Locust faced each other angrily.

People noticed that the stranger looked as if he had traveled a long distance. And he had a mail-pouch slung over his back. Furthermore, he was enough like Kiddie and Leaper to be a cousin of either one of them.

A person couldn't see his horns, on account of the hat that he wore.

When this traveler asked about the dispute, everybody hastened to explain the quarrel to him.

He listened carefully, and when he had heard the whole story he said:

"This message—do you know where it is? Do you know who has it now?"

"No!" Leaper the Locust cried, while Kiddie Katydid echoed the word.

"Ah! I thought not!" said the stranger, "I thought not, because I have it in this mail-bag. And now I must confess that I'm puzzled myself; for I don't know which one it's intended for." And he pulled off his hat and began fanning himself with it.

It was perfectly plain to everyone that he was sadly perplexed.

Then Leaper the Locust gave a great shout.

"You're a Short-horn!" he exclaimed. "It can't be that you would have a message for a person with horns like his!" He pointed a scornful finger at poor Kiddie Katydid.

One glance at the stranger's head—now that he had removed his hat—told everybody that Leaper the Locust was not mistaken.

The stranger's horns were short. There was no denying that fact.

"I believe you must be the Mr. Grasshopper I'm looking for," said the stranger.

Then he put his hand inside his mail-pouch and pulled out a letter.

Leaper the Locust made a sudden jump for the massage. But he was so eager that he sprang too far. He sailed far over the stranger's head and landed some distance away.

"Hullo! He doesn't want it!" said the stranger. "It must be for you!" And he shoved the message into Kiddie Katydid's willing hands.

Almost immediately Leaper the Locust jumped back again.

But, of course, he was too late.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

AN ITCHING NOSE

THE idea that an itching nose means that "company is coming," or "a stranger is coming" is now merely a common and widespread superstition. But it was not always thus. There was a time when the nose actually announced the coming of company or a stranger, not by itching, it is true, but by the exercise of those keen olfactory powers which it possessed in the days of our primitive ancestors.

Scientists tell us that primitive man's organs of smell were so well developed in acuteness and kept sharp by constant use, that his olfactory powers were equal, if not superior, to those possessed today by the lower animals remarkable for their gift of scent. Many tribes of savages retain to this day extraordinary powers in this respect. Mr. Caveman was, in all probability, a rather high-scented creature and when he went with a party of friends to visit the dwelling of Mr. Cliffdweller, if the wind was right, that gentleman could smell him coming a long way off, just as many of the lower animals today "snuff the tainted gale" and become aware of the approach of their enemies before they can see them. Civilization has caused the sense of smell to become atrophied in modern man but though the nose has lost its power it has retained its reputation by means of a popular superstition.

The Hotel Stenographer

By Roe Fulkerson

"THAT'S Henry Hammond's son," explained the House Detective.

"That's why I do not like him," answered the Hotel Stenographer, looking after a young man who had just given her some dictation. "I have no use for a boy who is celebrated because he is somebody's son.

"A lot of sons of famous men loaf around Peacock Alley here in this hotel and several of them have tried to make me. I turn them all down promptly.

"I play with a lot of boys whose fathers I never heard of. Some of them were hod carriers and some of them were preachers; some of them were small-town merchants and some of them were farmers. I never care. I am interested in their jobs, not their ancestry. I never loved a dog because its papa and mama were registered and had been in a bench show. It's the dog I like and nobody can pick out their ancestors, anyway.

"A lot of boys think they can get by in the world because of what their papas did. They may be able to get their money that way, but they can't get me.

"I would rather know a boy who had taken a half-nelson on the world and twisted a living out of it for himself. When I am with him I may have to ride in a flivver but with good roads everywhere a flivver is good enough. I may have to go to the 'movies' instead of having orchestra chairs in a swell theater but the 'movies' are often better than the theater, anyway. I wonder what certain rich boys would have done if they had gone to public school and had a paper route? Would they spend so freely if they knew how hard a dollar is to get? Every boy I play with is a possible husband and I always wonder what father's son would do to make a living if papa's money ran out and I was married to him. Nix! Give me a boy with a union card and a good trade."

When Eddie Laemmle was making "Spook Ranch" it was only natural that the boys got to telling ghost stories. Finally some one asked a darkey who worked in the cast if he had ever stayed in a haunted house.

"Ah sure has," admitted the black man, "But never again!"

"Why, what happened?"

"Well, suh, long 'bout two in de mawnin' Ah wakes up, an' dar comes Mistah Ghost right through de wall, jes' like dat wall wasn't dar."

"And what did you do?"

"Me? Ah went through de other wall de same way."

As Told by Irvin S. Cobb

AN ECHO FROM 1865

I RATHER guess they have been telling this one ever since the war between the states. Indeed for all I know to the contrary it may date back as far as the first and second Punic wars. For a good story never really dies. It merely goes into retirement for a season or a decade or a century and rises up again when occasion suits with its youth miraculously restored.

Now this present story may be of any age you please, but to the best of my personal knowledge and belief it belongs to our own Civil war period.

I know I first heard it years ago from an old gentleman who had served in a Texas regiment from 1861 to 1865. I had almost forgotten it when here the other day a friend wrote me telling the same yarn and saying that he had it from his father.

The narrative runs that in the last days of the war a ragged, wornout, hungry, half-dead Confederate straggler was limping along a Virginia highway striving to catch up with his command. Where there was a puddle in the ruts he stopped to bathe his bruised and bleeding feet. As he sat at the roadside dabbling his swollen toes in the water a Union skirmisher, well fed and lusty, stepped from behind a tree with his musket raised to his shoulder and yelled out exultantly:

"Now I got you!"

"Yas," drawled the Southerner, "an' a h—l of a git you got!"

AMUNDSEN POLAR TRIP COMPLETED

Few Rocky Islands Only Land Seen by Explorers Who Rode Giant Blimp

Nome, Alaska.—Lincoln Ellsworth of the Amundsen-Ellsworth transpolar expedition told the Associated Press here Monday that he saw much open water at the North Pole when he and his 17 companions passed over it last Tuesday night in the dirigible, Norge.

This statement by Ellsworth provided an answer to a question that has puzzled geographers and explorers for many years and which was not completely settled with the visits of Commander Peary and Lieutenant Commander Byrd in their first trips to the pole because of the limited amount of area viewed by them there.

Mr. Ellsworth said that rocky islands were seen at the pole but that these could hardly be considered land.

Drops U. S. Flag on Pole

The explorer said he dropped an American flag on the pole making the second time the colors of the United States has been placed there. Peary was the first to plant the American colors on the top of the earth. Byrd, in his flight over the pole, said he did not drop any flag, because Peary had left the colors there.

Their aerial adventure over, Amundsen and Ellsworth today awaited a steamer from the south to take them to the United States.

The Norge is being dismantled for shipment south by steamer when the ice permits resumption of navigation. It is expected to reassemble the blimp for further flights in the future.

Chilly Reception

Captain Amundsen, Ellsworth, Capt. Oscar Wisting and Lieut. Oskar Omdahl, arrived here in a launch from Teller Sunday.

They received a chilly reception, quite different from the welcome planned for the explorers by the residents of Nome when it was announced the flight would end at Nome. Everywhere preparations were made here to receive the Norge.

When it was learned Amundsen had changed his plans and descended at Teller, plans for the reception fell flat and much of the interest and enthusiasm for the explorers was lost. Few went to meet Amundsen when the launch bringing him from Teller arrived.

No Explanation

Amundsen made no direct explanation of his change in plans other than to remark that he thought a wireless station could be erected at Teller because of its superior harbor. One explanation was seen by many here in the fact that freight rates to the United States are considerably less from Teller than they are from here.

The explorers were pleased with their voyage. The Norge, they said, behaved perfectly. The flight from Spitzenbergen to Teller was made in approximately 71 hours. The flight was uneventful except for the stretch from Point Barrow to Teller when ice particles flying from the propeller threatened to puncture the gas cells. A fair wind aided the ship in the southern leg of the flight.

The landing at Teller was accomplished with ease after an anchor had been cast in the frozen harbor. The gas cells were completely deflated in half an hour.

Amundsen and Wisting have the distinction of being the only two men in the world to have visited both the North and South poles, Wisting having accompanied Amundsen on his discovery of the South pole.

The four men are staying at a log cabin which has been named "The Explorers' Club of Nome."

The explorers said they slept little on the flight. They said the blimp's gondola was too small to permit the men to lie down.

Much Still Unexplored

New York—The flight of the Norge, over the North pole added 100,000 square miles to the earth's explored area, but leaves between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000,000 square miles as yet unseen by civilized man.

The largest area is 2,000,000 square miles in the Antarctic, which explorers consider uninteresting because the Antarctic continent is known to be covered with ice 7,000 to 10,000 feet thick.

The Amundsen-Ellsworth expedition cut the 1,000 mile Arctic area in two, leaving 600,000 square miles of unexplored territory toward Siberia, and 300,000 toward the east. Although no land was discovered by the Norge, explorers point out that islands are found throughout known Arctic regions, and that birds have been seen migrating toward that section.

Liquor Ring Investigated

Cleveland—Operators of a beer syndicate in a dozen states with western Pennsylvania as the source of supply were under investigation by a federal grand jury here Monday. Scores of witnesses were here for questioning by A. E. Bernsteen, district attorney, who called the syndicate one of the largest beer and alcohol combines in the history of prohibition. Big breweries in Scranton and Wilkesbarre, Bernsteen said, operated with retail bootleggers in Cleveland, Chicago and other cities.

Airships and Great Guns

According to the occassionally reliable Moscow newspapers, the United States has the greatest military aviation service in the world. Russian newspapers now describe two American dirigibles, each mounting 20 cannon. The United States also has 14,000 military airplanes, according to the information on which the Russian commissar of war and navy bases his comparison to show the needs of the Soviet union. Though giant dirigibles capable of mounting 20 machine guns have not progressed beyond the drawing-board stage in the navy department designers' office, they have become an actuality in Russian newspapers that have printed pictures of them, cannons and all. Chapter VII—Continued

Her touch thrilled him. It sent little throbs through his body, a tremulous quivering which she could feel and which deepened the glow in her eyes. Gently her hand stroked his head and his back. It seemed to Nepeese that he did not breathe. Under the caress of her hand his eyes closed. In another moment she was talking to him, and at the sound of her voice his eyes shot open.

"He will come here—that beast—and he will kill us," she was saying. "He will kill you because you bit him, Baree. Ugh, I wish you were bigger, and stronger, so that you could take off his head for me!"

She was untying the babiche from about the table-leg, and under her breath she laughed. She was not frightened. It was a tremendous adventure—and she throbbed with exultation at the thought of having beaten the man-beast in her own way. She could see him in the pool struggling and beating about like a great fish. He was just about crawling out of the chasm now—and she laughed again as she caught Baree up under her arm.

"Oh—oopi-nao—but you are heavy!" she gasped. "And yet I must carry you—because I am going to run!"

She hurried outside. Pierrot had not come, and she darted swiftly into the balsams back of the cabin, with Baree hung in the crook of her arm, like a sack filled at both ends and tied in the middle. He felt like that, too. But he still had no inclination to wriggle himself free. Nepeese ran with him until her arm ached. Then she stopped and put him down on his feet, holding to the end of the caribou-skin thong that was tied about his neck. And then the Willow spoke to him softly.

"You are not going to run away, Baree. Non, you are going to stay with me, and we will kill that man-beast if he dares do to me again what he did back there." She flung back the loose hair from about her flushed face, and for a moment she forgot Baree as she thought of that half minute at the edge of the chasm. He was looking straight up at her when her glance fell on him again. "Non, you are not going to run away—you are going to follow me," she whispered. "Come."

The babiche string tightened about Baree's neck as she urged him to follow. It was like another rabbit-snare, and he braced his fore-feet and bared his fangs just a little. The Willow did not pull. Fearlessly she put her hand on his head again. From the direction of the cabin came a shout, and at the sound of it she took Baree up under her arm once more.

"Bete noir—bete noir!" she called back tauntingly, but only loud enough to be heard a few yards away. "Go back to Lac Bain—owases—you wild beast!"

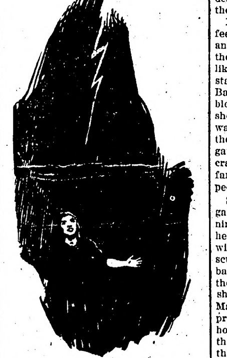
Nepeese began to make her way swiftly through the forest. It grew deeper and darker, and there were no trails. They came at last into an open. It was a tiny meadow in the heart of the forest, not more than three or four times as big as the cabin; underfoot the grass was soft and green, and thick with flowers. Straight through the heart of this little oasis trickled a streamlet across which the Willow jumped with Baree under her arm, and on the edge of the rill was a small wigwam made of freshly cut spruce and balsam boughs. Into her diminutive mekewap the Willow thrust her head to see that things were as she had left them yesterday. Then, with a long breath of relief, she put down her four-legged burden and fastened the end of the babiche to one of the cut spruce limbs.

Baree burrowed himself back into the wall of the wigwam, and with head alert—and eyes wide open—watched attentively what happened after this. Not a movement of the Willow escaped him. She was radiant—and happy. Her laugh, sweet and wild as a bird's trill, set Baree's heart throbbing with a desire to jump about with her among the flowers.

For a time Nepeese seemed to forget Baree. Her wild blood raced with the joy of her triumph over the Factor from Lac Bain. She saw him again, floundering about in the pool—pictured him at the cabin now, soaked and angry, demanding of mon pere where she had gone. And mon pere, with a shrug of his shoulders, was telling him that he didn't know—that probably she had run into the forest. It did not enter into her head that in tricking Bush McTaggart in that way she had played with dynamite. She did not foresee the peril that in an instant would have stamped the wild flush from her face and curdled the blood in her veins—did not guess that McTaggart had become for her a deadlier menace than ever.

After a little Nepeese returned to Baree. She brought him water and gave him a piece of raw fish. For hours they were alone, and with each hour there grew stronger in Baree the desire to follow the girl in every movement she made, to crawl close to her when she sat down, to feel the touch of her dress, of her hand—and hear her voice. But he did not show this desire. He was still a little savage of the forests—a four-footed barbarian born half of a wolf and half of a dog; and he lay still. With Umisk he would have played. With Oohoomisew he would have fought. At Bush McTaggart he would have bared his fangs, and buried them deep when the chance came. But the girl was different. Like the Kazan of old, he had begun to worship. If the Willow had freed Baree, he would not have run away. His eyes were never away from her. He watched her build a small fire and cook a piece of the fish. He watched her eat her dinner. It was quite late in the afternoon when she came and sat down close to him, with her lap full of flowers which she twined in the long, shining braids of her hair. Then, playfully, she began beating Baree with the end of one of these braids. He shrank under the soft blows, and with that low, birdlike laughter in her throat, Nepeese drew his head into her lap, where the scatter of flowers lay. She talked to him. Her hand stroked his head. He breathed in the flower-scented perfume of it—and lay as if dead. It was a glorious moment. Nepeese, looking down on him, could not see that he was breathing.

There came an interruption. It was the snapping of a dry stick. Through the forest Pierrot had come with the stealth of a cat, and when they looked up, he stood at the edge of the open. Baree knew that it was not Bush McTaggart. But it was a man-beast! Instantly his body stiffened under the Willow's hand. He drew back slowly and cautiously from her lap, and as Pierrot advanced, Baree snarled. The next instant Nepeese had risen and had run to Pierrot. The look in her father's face alarmed her.



Her Half Wild Soul Thrilled to the Crash and Fire of It.

"What has happened, mon pere?" she cried.

Pierrot shrugged his shoulders.

"Nothing, ma Nepeese—except that you have roused a thousand devils in the heart of the Factor from Lac Bain and that—"

He stopped as he saw Baree, and pointed at him.

"Last night when M'sieu the Factor caught him in a snare, he bit M'sieu's hand. M'sieu's hand is swollen twice its size, and I can see his blood turning black. It is pechipoo."

"Pechipoo!" gasped Nepeese.

She looked into Pierrot's eyes. They were dark, and filled with a sinister gleam—a flash of exultation, she thought.

"Yes, it is the blood-poison," said Pierrot. A gleam of cunning shot into his eyes as he looked over his shoulder, and nodded. "I have hidden the medicine—and told him there is no time to lose in getting back to Lac Bain. And he is afraid—that devil! He is waiting. With that blackening hand, he is afraid to start back alone—and so I go with him. And listen, ma Nepeese. We will be away by sundown, and there is something you must know before I go."

Baree saw them there, close together in the shadows thrown by the tall spruce trees. He heard the low murmur of their voices—chiefly of Pierrot's, and at last he saw Nepeese put her two arms up around the man-beast's neck, and then Pierrot went away again into the forest. He thought that the Willow would never turn her face toward him after that. For a long time she stood looking in the direction which Pierrot had taken. And when, after a time, she turned and came back to Baree, she did not look like the Nepeese who had been twining flowers in her hair. The laughter was gone from her face and eyes. She knelt down beside him and with sudden fierceness she cried:

"It is pechipoo, Baree! It was you—you—who put the poison in his blood. And I hope he dies! For I am afraid—afraid!"

She shivered.

Perhaps it was in this moment that the Great Spirit of things meant Baree to understand—that at last it was given him to comprehend that his day had dawned, that the rising and the setting of his sun no longer existed in the sky, but in this girl whose hand rested on his head. He whined softly, and inch by inch he dragged himself nearer to her until again his head rested in the hollow of her lap.

For a long time after Pierrot left them the Willow did not move from where she had seated herself beside Baree. It was at last the deepening shadows and a near rumble in the sky that roused her from the fear of the things Pierrot had told her. When she looked up, black clouds were massing slowly over the open space above the spruce-tops. Darkness was falling. In the whisper of the wind and the dead stillness of the thickening gloom there was the sullen brewing of storm.

Nepeese shivered and rose to her feet. For the first time Baree got up, and he stood close at her side. Above them a lightning-flash cut the clouds like a knife of fire, followed in an instant by a terrific crash of thunder. Baree shrank back as if struck by a blow. He would have slunk into the shelter of the brush wall of the wigwam, but there was something about the Willow as he looked at her which gave him confidence. The thunder crashed again. But he retreated no farther. His eyes were fixed on Nepeese.

She stood straight and slim in that gathering gloom riven by the lightning, her beautiful head thrown back, her lips parted, and her eyes glowing with an almost eager anticipation—a sculptured goddess welcoming with bated breath the onrushing forces of the heavens. Perhaps it was because she was born on a night of storm. Many times Pierrot and the dead princess mother had told her that—how on the night she had come into the world the crash of thunder and the flare of lightning had made the hours an inferno, how the streams had burst over their banks and the stems of ten thousand forest trees had snapped in its fury—and the beat of the deluge on their cabin roof had drowned the sound of her mother's pain, and of her own first babyish cries.

On that night, it may be, the Spirit of Storm was born in Nepeese. She loved to face it, as she was facing it now. It made her forget all things but the splendid might of nature; her half-wild soul thrilled to the crash and fire of it; often she had reached up her bare arms and laughed with joy as the deluge burst about her. Even now she might have stood there in the little open until the rain fell, if a whine from Baree had not turned her. As the first big drops struck with the dull thud of leaden bullets about them, she went with him into the balsam shelter. It seemed an interminable time before the thunder rolled far to the east, and the lightning died away into distant and intermittent flashings. Even after that the rain fell for another hour. Then it stopped as suddenly as it had begun.

With a laughing gasp Nepeese rose to her feet. The water gurgled in her moccasins as she walked out into the open. She paid no attention to Baree—and he followed her. Across the open in the treetops the last of the storm-clouds were drifting away.

Nepeese looked down and saw Baree. He was standing clear and unleashed, with freedom on all sides of him. Yet he did not run. He was waiting, wet as a water-rat, with his eyes on her expectantly. Nepeese made a movement toward him, and hesitated.

"No, you will not run away, Baree. I will leave you free. And now we must have a fire! Let us hunt for the wuskwi, Baree."

Horrible Methods of Treating the Insane

Until within the last century insane persons were treated with terrible cruelty in nearly all "civilized" countries, and as late as 1770 lunatics were exhibited at public fairs in England, and as late as 1815 there were exposures of terrible cruelties in the Bethlehem hospital in England, and this led to gradual improvements and the introduction of enlightened and scientific methods in the care of the mentally afflicted.

One of the mildest of the old forms of treatment of mad people, and long in vogue at Strathfillan, in Perthshire, Scotland, was connected with the observance of the festival of St. Fillan, a Scottish saint.

Insane people were dipped in the "holy pool," where St. Fillan had bathed in the Seventh century. Many quaint ceremonies were connected with this "ducking." After the immersion the lunatics were herded to St. Fillan's chapel, and strapped to the floor, to be left all night.

Those who managed to free their bonds and escape were considered cured. Experience did not bear out this pious belief, however, and the custom gradually declined.

Live on Camels

The Tuareg, found over a large area in northern Africa, are nomads who live principally by means of, and on, camels. Tuareg women are as free as women in Britain. They go about unveiled, while the men are always veiled. The women choose their own husbands, and teach the children to read and write. They can own property, even after marriage, and their husbands have no control over it. Caste and authority are inherited through the mothers.

Color Blindness

It is peculiar that they should call a man yellow when he displays the white feather.

If you want to buy a car on time

IT is to your advantage to buy the car that you can comfortably afford, on a payment plan that gives you a sure margin of safety.

General Motors has its own finance company, the General Motors Acceptance Corporation, operating the GMAC Plan. Through its service more than 1,000,000 families have purchased cars comfortably out of income.

On August 1 last, the price of this service, which had always been low, was further reduced. And the automobile-buying public is now saving millions of dollars annually as a result of this reduction and the influence of General Motors' leadership.

The purchase of automobiles on time is a universally accepted practice. The car is a utility and it is sound business to conserve capital and use credit. But buy on sound terms and at low rates. Any General Motors dealer will explain the advantages of the GMAC Plan.

Father Now Cast for Untried Role

If the plans of a group of English clubwomen, some thousands strong, go through, father will spend his evenings beside the mending basket and the undarned sock. He will wash up the supper dishes, tidy up the parlor and scrub up the front steps.

Friend husband, in short, will do his share of the housework. He will sweep, dust, cook, wash and on Mother's evenings out (which will be more frequent than formerly) he will take care of the children.

Mother calls attention to the fact that she, too, has had a full day while father was at the office, and that any knickknacks or chores which happen to be left over when supper is done are to be shared henceforth on a 50-50 basis.

Detroit women agree that the 50-50 basis would be a fine adjustment, and many think that the boy should be trained for housekeeping as well as the girl. There is a long road to travel before this happens, however, according to Frank Cody, superintendent of Detroit schools.

GOVERNOR CHRISTIANSON STRIKES CONSTRUCTIVE NOTE AT FARIBAULT

Opening Address in Campaign for Republican Nomination Emphasizes Benefits of State Reorganization Plan, and Conservation of State's Resources.

Protection of the resources of Minnesota—of her natural resources through conservation and of her tax resources through economy in government—was the dominant note of the address delivered by Governor Theodore Christianson at Faribault Wednesday, May 12, in opening his campaign for the Republican nomination for Governor. He reviewed progress made along these lines in the sixteen months he has been at the head of the State government.

"In submitting my candidacy for re-election," said Governor Christianson, "I make overtures to no political boss and promise obedience to no political group. I recognize no fealty but to the people of the state.

I believe that campaign promises are made to be kept. Two years ago I told the people that if they elected me Governor, I would use the power of the Governor's office to check the mounting cost of government. That promise has been kept. I now tell them that if they re-elect me, I will continue the job I have started. That promise, too, will be kept.

The kind of economy I stand for—the only kind of economy I believe in—is economy that needs no adjective or qualification.

I submit that there is need for that kind of economy, and more of it. The expenditures of government, curtailed at Washington, have continued to increase in most of the States. Governmental cost payments of the States increased from less than half a billion dollars in 1915 to more than a billion and a half in 1924; in other words, the cost of State Government in the United States more than trebled in nine years.

There have been corresponding increases in local expenditures. Counties, townships, cities, villages and school districts have piled expenditure upon expenditure, until the burden is threatening to crush American industry and enterprise. The total tax bill of America, which was $2,000,000,000 in 1913, was $7,500,000,000 in 1923. In ten years the burden almost quadrupled. In 1913 the taxes paid by the American people represented 6.4 per cent of their income; in 1923, 11.5 per cent.

And these figures, startling as they are, do not tell the whole story. For after taxing to the limit, the various units of government borrowed. In 1923, they issued bonds in an aggregate amount of $2,500,000,000, bringing the total of public expenditures to $10,000,000,000. And, in order that you may know that the upward trend has not ceased, let me inform you that in 1924, the expenditures of government in America were a billion dollars more than in 1923.

The Federal government has been reducing its expenditures, but the States and their subdivisions are, with a few notable exceptions, still competing with each other with the evident purpose of determining which can spend most without paralyzing the people's capacity to pay.

I said "a few notable exceptions". I am proud and glad to say that Minnesota is one of the exceptions. The upward trend was stopped in our State in 1925.

The total biennial appropriations for Minnesota in 1915 were $18,000,000; in 1917 they were $22,000,000; in 1919, $32,000,000; in 1921, $37,000,000; in 1923, more than $40,000,000. In 1925 the appropriations were held down to approximately the same total as in 1923, despite the fact that appropriations for State aid to schools were increased more than $100,000 over those of the previous biennium; those for eradication of tuberculosis in cattle nearly $350,000; and those for forest fire prevention and reforestation nearly $75,600.

Further, not satisfied with merely stopping the upward trend of State expenditures, the present administration has taken steps to effect reductions. It secured the enactment of a law permitting the appointment of any person already holding a State office to any additional State office without increase of compensation.

Reorganization of State Government.

Another step taken by the present administration to effect a reduction of expenditures was the beginning of the reorganization of State departments through consolidation and merging of related activities. You will note that I said "beginning". I used the word advisedly, for the process has not been finished. It has only been begun. In fact, the task is too big, the readjustments to be effected too many, to be completed in one year, or even in two. The law attempts to merge most of the ninety-two boards, bureaus and departments of the State government into fourteen major departments. Actually, the law effected only paper consolidations. It is the task of the Governor and the heads of the various departments to translate each paper consolidation into an organic union. That work is progressing as rapidly as may be, but it has not been completed. It will not be fully accomplished for some time.

The Budget System.

The third step in the tax reduction program was to set up some system through which the Governor might control the expenditures of State departments.

The reorganization act gives the Governor effective control of State expenditures through the Department of Administration and Finance. The unique feature of this system of financial control is the pre-audit. The Finance Board may grant a requisition in full, it may allow some items and disallow others, and it may reduce any item. In other words, it may do anything with a requisition except raise it. It can use its powers to reduce expenditures; it has no power to raise them.

I assume that you are inwardly asking the question: "How much money will the new budget system save?" I wish I could answer that question, but I am going to tell you frankly that I can't. Nobody can answer it, until after the end of the first fiscal year of operation under it, on June 30th of this year. The total of savings should in a general way be the unexpended balances at the end of the present fiscal year plus the amounts paid out of this year's appropriations to cover last year's obligations.

The budget system should save more money during the second year than during the first; more during the third year than during the second. Reducing expenditures does not involve any spectacular achievements; it does not make first-page copy. It consists in finding the thousands of small items of extravagance and stopping them. It consists in making every dollar of tax money render one hundred cents of service.

Boom Due For Northwest Minn.

With reports of oil wells in Kandiyohi and Ottertail counties, iron ore deposits in Clearwater county, near Clearbrook, and rich mineral beds in the Red Lake region north of Winnipeg, large tracts of the best farm land in the northwest in Marshall county, it seems that this section of the country is due for a boom in the near future. In addition, alfalfa grows like a weed in Pennington county. The same can be said about the other counties in this corner of the state.

The American Youth and Teacher Award was established as a tribute to American youth and teachers by the Board of Directors of the Sesqui-Centennial International Exposition, through which the people of the United States and the world at large will celebrate the 150th anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence. The exposition will run from June 1 to December 1. Miss Adams' entry blank cited her for heroism displayed recently when she remained inside a burning building helping doctors render first aid to injured firemen. She is a candidate for the Golden Eaglette, the highest gift within the hands of the Girl Scouts. Each state will elect a girl and boy and one teacher to represent them and the successful candidates will be the guest of the Sesqui officials from June 28 to July 5 at the exposition. This will also include a trip to Washington where they will be received by President Coolidge and presented with medals.

Big Fish Caught Near Detroit

Louis Benshoof of Detroit, candidate for the Republican nomination for congressman, was in the city last week and incidentally told The Times about a 178-pound sturgeon which had been caught in one of the lakes near Detroit by an Indian boy. It is believed to be the biggest fish ever caught in Minnesota waters and is being stuffed for display at Detroit. The sturgeon had become stranded on a shallow sandbar and was unable to get back to the lake, so the boy and his brother killed it with an ax. Mr. Benshoof vouches for the truth of the story, which he says is not the kind of a "fish story" handed out by some enthusiastic fishermen. ——Thief River Falls Times.

Ruler of Baroda, Son of Herdsman

Maharajah Gaekwar Has Governed Indian State for 50 Years.

Washington.—The gaekwar of Baroda has achieved a record. He has sat upon his throne for 50 years, an unusual term among Indian rulers in recent centuries. Therefore, Baroda has had a jubilee, climaxed by a great state dinner at which the important citizens of Baroda sat cross-legged on the floor of the palace audience hall with eastern viands before them, while the maharajah gaekwar sat alone at a table in a chair of state. The state over which the oddly titled ruler has presided for half a century is described in a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society.

"Islands" on Dry Land.

"Baroda, one of the wealthiest of the Indian native states, is a group of 'islands' on dry land," says the bulletin. "Only prewar Prussia had more scattered dominions. There are four main divisions, but about each of the larger regions cluster small districts, and even separate villages that fairly pepper the territory of the Bombay presidency of British India, in which the gaekwar's 'islands' lie. There is probably a separate fragment of Barodan territory for each of the 50 years the gaekwar has ruled.

"The territories, which total 8,000 square miles, begin near the west coast of India, 150 miles north of Bombay city, and extend for 200 miles to the north. Other fragments are scattered off to the west on the Kathiwar peninsula, the most remote being 225 miles from Baroda City, the capital.

"Most of the state is level alluvium in a high state of cultivation. This is especially true of the region lying to the north of the capital. With its fields, well ordered hedges, and groves of trees, this section has much the appearance of English park land. Some of India's best cotton land is in Baroda, and the state has 25 gins and a cotton mill. Rice and wheat are raised, and a considerable area is devoted to poppy growing for the making of opium. Growers of poppy are licensed, and the handling of opium is a state monopoly.

"Baroda City has a population of 103,000. There, and in the vicinity, are the palaces of the gaekwar. The white stucco palace of Nazar Bagh is notable chiefly as the Barodan strong box. In it are stored the gaekwar's jewels, said to be worth $10,000,000. Among them is one of the world's famous diamonds, 'the Star of the South,' of 125 karats. Another unit of the collection is a cloth embroidered with precious stones and seed pearls. This was prepared for a Mohammedan ruler and was meant as a cover for the tomb of Mohammed.

"Four miles south of the city is the Makapura palace, the country place of the gaekwar. It is noted for its fine gardens, fountains, grottoes, and pergolas. The chief of the ruler's residences is the Lakshmi Vilas. In it is a huge Darbar hall around which are covered and screened wooden galleries from which the women of the gaekwar's menage may observe state functions without being seen.

"Leading off the main street of Baroda City are numerous 'wards,' each set aside for a separate caste or class. These are culs de sac, and across their entrances are heavy gates. In certain sections of the town English influences are noticeable. Baroda college has its cricket grounds, its tennis courts, and its gymnasium. Baroda spends more on public education than any other native state, maintaining public schools for both boys and girls. There are even zenana classes for adult women who must remain in seclusion.

From Hut to Palace.

"The 2,500,000 inhabitants of Baroda belong predominantly to the Hindu faith, and the pinnacles of numerous Hindu temples pierce the skyline of the capital. The minority religions are not molested, and the gaekwar, in fact, patronizes one of the chief Mohammedan festivals.

"The life of the present gaekwar has been like that of the hero of a fairy tale. In 1875 the ruler of Baroda was accused of attempting to poison the British resident, and was deposed. He had no heir, so a search was made by the British government for a collateral relative. A young lad, the son of a humble herdsman, was chosen and was placed on the throne in 1876. It is he who is the present gaekwar.

"Baroda is important as well as wealthy. The gaekwar is one of only five Indian rulers entitled to receive a salute of 21 guns anywhere in India."

LOWLY MOSQUITO GIVEN CREDIT FOR U. S. POWER

Insect Prevented Establishment of Dominant Civilization In American Tropics, Scientist Says.

Chicago.—The lowly mosquito made us what we are today. At least, yellow fever and malaria mosquitoes have been largely influential in giving the United States a leading rank among the nations of the world.

That tribute came from a bitter enemy of the insects, the Gorgas Memorial institute. It is contained in a report for the institute prepared by Joseph A. Le Prince, international authority on mosquitoes and senior sanitary engineer of the federal public health service.

Had malaria and yellow fever not rebuffed the early settlers in American tropics, the institute said, a dominant civilization would have resulted and, with its earlier start, would have been detrimental to the colonial settlements along the Atlantic to the north.

The early Spanish colonies of the central plains of Central and South America had wealth and opportunity for growth and development, but they could not hold their ground against the dreaded mosquito, said the report.

This eventually led to emigration from Europe directed to the northern part of the continent, and since that time, the institute conceded, the mosquitoes have lent vigorous and continuous although unsolicited, support to the Monroe doctrine.

But the work of the mosquito has been done and, while paying tribute to a falling foe, the institute announced that the warfare will be pressed until there is a mosquitoless America.

No Indiana man ever has been appointed to the United States Supreme court.

Havoc Was Extensive in Krupp Dismantling

London.—Remarkable figures showing the havoc wrought at the Krupp works under the direction of the interally control commission are given in the report presented at the annual meeting of the company, says a Berlin correspondent.

The machines destroyed numbered 9,300 and had a total weight of about 60,000 tons. The dies and tools sacrificed reached the prodigious total of 801,420, their aggregate weight being 9,588 tons.

Further, 379 presses, tempering furnaces, oil and water tanks, cooling plants and overhead travelers were scrapped on the commission demands. On the testing grounds 159 experimental guns and 1,100 tons of ammunition were destroyed. The replacement value of all this property is estimated at about 104,000,000 marks.

The report mentions that the concern is now permitted to make annually not more than four guns above seventeen inches.

Fort Centuries Old Is Discovered in Kentucky

Lexington, Ky.—Discovery of a prehistoric fort in a "lost world" in the Kentucky mountains was announced recently.

Prof. W. G. Burroughs of Berea college, the South's largest mountain school, told the Kentucky Academy of Science in annual convention that the fort, a half-mile south of Indian Fort mountain, explored by him, and one of the largest prehistoric forts in the nation, probably is several thousand years old. The "lost world" in Madison county extends 20 acres within two grim sets of cliffs, 50 to 200 feet high.

Prehistoric armor, made from pure Lake Superior copper, was unearthed by the professor, who tripped over skeletons which had been lying flat for centuries after a consuming rite to the god of fire.

Says Prince of Wales Talks Like Cockney

London.—The prince of Wales has a marked cockney accent, according to the dramatist, St. John Greer Ervine, who publicly debated the question, "Do we know how to pronounce English?" with the actor-manager, Nigel Playfair, recently.

Mr. Ervine grew hot over "the vile cockney accent and horrible Oxford voice" and appealed to women not to marry men guilty of talking in such voices.

The prince of Wales, Mr. Ervine declared, does not sound the letter "R" when speaking, although King George and Queen Mary do. The prince, he added, says "Howp" when he means "Hope" and one of the prince's brothers recently referred in a speech to the "dook of Yawk."

Mr. Playfair stood up for the English spoken in southeast England. This moved Mr. Ervine to wrath and he got back at Mr. Playfair by asking why he called his first name "Sinjin" instead of "Saint John."

THE PIECE OF CHEESE

By M. and R. M. TERRELL

(©, 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)

MR. BARROWS' eyes grew round with awe and surprise as he gazed from the card on his desk to the ruddy, lean young man lounging at the opposite desk.

"You're Avery Anstyne, Jr.," he stammered.

"Not a word to anyone in the office, understand?" the far-from-pampered-looking young man went on briskly. "Not a word to anyone in town. I'm just plain Anstyne, the new manager of the branch, a cousin of the old man's. I'm here to work anyway, not to fox trot. Business is rotten here. Besides I'm sick of New York. I don't want a lot of high-faced society dames trotting out their daughters and doing flipflops for me. Or for the money I'm supposed to get some day."

"Sure, Mr. Anstyne, I understand," agreed Barrows, who didn't understand at all, but felt the threat under young Anstyne's bristling words. Fancy being super rich and not wanting anyone to know it. Ah, probably a subtle pose, thought Barrows suddenly. Dealing yourself out at the psychological moment; surely. After you've seen them first.

"Now, about typist, my private secretary," young Anstyne broke into the Barrows ruminations. "Send in your best. Your speediest girl."

"There's two now. Both efficiency plus. Miss Peach and Miss Cheese," recited Barrows in three puffs.

"Peach? Cheese? See here, Barrows, I'm serious. I'm not running a grocery but an office and—"

"I should say Miss Peachley and Miss Cheeseborough," coughed Barrows. "Nicknames, Mr. Anstyne, 's all."

"Call a spade a spade after this," admonished the young man.

"Yes sir. Both are tiptop typists. I use Peach—Peachley. She's easier on the eyes. Miss Cheeseborough, well, sir, she wouldn't win—"

Young Anstyne was from New York. "Send in the good looking one," he ordered. "Er, Barrows, send 'em both in. I'll judge for myself."

In the outer office Barrows took pretty stately Miss Peachley aside. "Look here, Peach, you're always scheming about marrying a millionaire. I'm going to play Santa Claus for you."

"And take me to lunch, at the beanery, and tell me your salary's been raised and that you and your wife aren't really congenial; aw, Barrows, I've heard that bleat before—from you. You pulled it last week; remember? Lay off. Grab a pen and work it. I'm busy."

"Forget your lines," snapped Barrows, flushing. "There's no law against liking the goods. . . . You're class plus and more, you get away with it, Peach." His eyes appreciatively estimated her smart crepe gown with its transparent shoulders, the sheen of her stockings, the cut of her slippers, the glossy perfection of her coiffure, the smartness of her combined vanity case, rouge box and cigarette case.

For contrast Mr. Barrows turned and gave Miss Cheeseborough a split once-over. She was clicking away at her machine and, to the Barrows eye, not to be easily distinguished from the rest of the office furniture.

"Listen, Peach, confidential," he went on. "New manager's really old New York Anstyne's only son. Oozles of jack coming to him! He's just told me to keep all this getting out to anyone, at the office or in town; see? But I'm playing my money on you, Peach. He told me to send him in a new secretary. I'm paging you, kid. Go in and give him a couple of eyefuls. And, get this, too; when you two're married don't forget little M. E. Barrows for the new general manager."

"What a cinch," thought Peachley when she eyed the ruddy, gray-eyed young millionaire through the fringe of her lashes.

"He looks lonely, poor boy!" thought Elsie Cheeseborough, blinking through her glasses, the huge dark rims of which distracted one's attention from the fact that her eyes were blue gentians, gentle and disconcertingly young. The unemphasized line of her lips was tender and wistful. Whatever beauties her slender body may have had were masked by the disconcerting primness of a black "business" suit with severe, immaculate collar and cuffs. Her blond hair, tightly bound, looked thin.

Anstyne chose Peachley. He was human, and masculine—and from New York.

Peach's coiffures became more elaborate day by day in every way. Her costumes displayed her to advantage. And ceaselessly, and adroitly, she sought to impress young Anstyne that she also was, in a way, a New Yorker, and only debarred from taking her rightful place in society there by financial misfortunes of her branch of the family. Did he hesitate in dictation over a metropolitan street address, she supplied it from memory—aloud. Her dear aunt, Mrs. Wilmerwing-Peachley, lived right around the corner; fancy! Young Anstyne smiled. He could afford to; she didn't know really who he was!

One night the Fates, whom, if legend tells us correctly, are homely women, caused young Anstyne to seek a forgotten overcoat at his office. The place was lighted up; distinctly he heard the click, click of a typewriter.

"What the merry devil!" he muttered. He entered and was confronted by a startled young girl in a blue dress and with a mass of golden curls hanging down her back.

"I beg your pardon!" He acted as though he had entered the wrong office. The young girl did, too. Miss Cheeseborough flushed furiously, the rosy color running into the roots of the shining hair and down tender lines of her throat. It was a long time since Anstyne had seen a girl blush!

"Mr. Anstyne, I'm so sorry," she cried. "No one has ever come here at night before." Slowly young Anstyne realized that this radiant young thing was—was "Miss Cheese."

"If I had only known—" began the embarrassed vision, acting like a culprit and trying hurriedly to pin up her hair. "I washed it; it dries quickly over a radiator. And the typing—"

Anstyne began to sniff the air. Miss Cheeseborough rushed to explanation.

"I'm taking a university extension course in cooking," she said. "I'm saving up to have a real home of my own some day. Mr. Anstyne, I'm—I'm hopelessly old-fashioned."

Young Anstyne took another sniff and, all of a moment, "Miss Cheese" recalled her rarebit on the tiny electric grill. She was just in time; the coffee, in another electric contrivance, was about to boil over.

Anstyne took a third sniff, Cheeseborough murmured something and they sat down and set to eating. Words weren't necessary—enticingly cooked food was! Anstyne hadn't eaten a real meal for years; he had always lived at his clubs.

Miss Cheeseborough did love to cook and, encouraged by Anstyne, she began to discuss her favorite recipes. The conversation went to chicken a la oh boy, sweetbread with asparagus tips, Vienna schnitzels that even a war couldn't put out of circulation, plum pudding with sauce, minced tenderloin a la some more, and old-time pot roast alias "Contre-filet roti maitre d'hotel," etc.

The conversation was very stimulating and it lasted into the wee hours. Young Anstyne insisted they get something to eat again. They went to the best restaurant in town; the contrast was quite eloquent. "Miss Cheese" was some cook!

They found much of mutual interest. "Miss Cheese," who came from the West, and wasn't ashamed of it, had had an uncle who had put the family in the limelight of fame. He had been shot by one of the Younger or James brothers; "Miss Cheese" wasn't sure. Young Anstyne assured her that his father and Jesse James were twins, or should have been! Oh, a pleasant evening was spent by all.

Some weeks later the stately Peachley rushed in on Barrows with a wire. "Say, Rat Face, what you know about this?" she fairly barked. "That ass Anstyne has gone and let 'Cheese' marry him! Get that; our little piece of cheese! Humph! I always knew she wasn't what she was!"

"Can you beat it?" echoed the flabbergasted Barrows.

It was about noon.

"I can," lisped Miss Peach, changing chameleon-like her voice. "Thanks, Barrows, old sport, I'm as hungry as a lady wolf. Where're we going to lunch? Say, a steady diet of cheese is likely to turn almost anybody's taste, huh? Come on, let's chow."

Phrases Long Noted as Tongue Twisters

The British Medical association is revising its list of tongue-twisters used as tests of intoxication. Among them have been such relatively simple phrases as "British constitution" and "truly rural," which, it has been held, a man cannot properly pronounce unless he is sober. It is not surprising that alumni of that fine school, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, usually abbreviate the title in conversation to "Tech" or "Boston Tech," for those who first put the name together evidently paid no heed to considerations of euphony or ease of pronunciation.

In the latter part of the Seventeenth century the recitation of the Lord's Prayer was a test of witchcraft in Massachusetts. If you were a witch, the court held, you could not say it properly. A woman was hanged because the judge insisted that she said "hollowed" instead of "hallowed," thereby making the sacred name of the Deity null and void.

A writer in the London Athenaeum once observed: "He cannot hope to scale the topmost heights of Parnassus who crams his mouth whilst singing with a gritty handful of consonants"; and Lowell said of Matthew Arnold's line on Shakespeare:

"Self-schooled, self-scanned, self-honored, self-secure" that it "hissed like an angry gander." What shall be said of the libretto of an opera, written in pursuance of the ideal of opera in English, which gives the prima donna this clashing collocation of "continuous rectitude," or at another point fills the mouth with the phrase, "A pair of stanch English thoroughbreds"? These things are difficult to say and still harder to sing. What can the librettist have been thinking of when he concocted them? Was he tone-deaf as well as ignorant of labial and lingual processes?—New York Herald-Tribune.

Log Formed "Gas Pipe"

A reminder of the first attempts at "modern conveniences" in Lincoln, Neb., was found when a hollow-log gas pipe laid in 1872 was unearthed recently in excavations for a new building. The pipe was made of an eight-inch log. The walls were two inches thick and had been soaked in pitch. According to gas-company officials, all of the gas mains were made of wood. The pipe unearthed was still in use and in sound condition. It was replaced with iron pipe and has been put in a local museum.

With her wet clothes clinging to her tightly, she was like a slim shadow as she crossed the soggy open and buried herself among the forest trees. Baree still followed. She went straight to a birch-tree that she had located that day and began tearing off the loose bark. An armful of this bark she carried close to the wigwam, and on it she heaped load after load of wet wood until she had a great pile. From a bottle in the wigwam she secured a dry match, and at the first touch of its tiny flame the birch-bark flared up like paper soaked in oil. Not until it was blazing a dozen feet into the air did she cease putting wood on it. Then she drove sticks into the soft ground and over these sticks stretched the blanket out to dry. After that she began to undress.

The rain had cooled the air, and the tonic of it—laden with the breath of the balsam and spruce—set the Willow's blood dancing in her veins. She forgot the discomfort of the deluge. She forgot the Factor from Lac Bain, and what Pierrot had told her. She danced about Baree, tossing her sea of hair about her, her naked body shimmering in and out of it, her eyes aglow, her lips laughing in her unreasoning happiness—the happiness of being alive, of drinking into her lungs the perfumed air of the forest, of seeing the stars and the wonderful sky above her. She stopped before Baree and cried laughingly at him, holding out her arms:

"Ahe, Baree—if you could only throw off your skin as easily as I have thrown off my clothes!"

She drew a deep breath, and her eyes shone with a sudden inspiration. Slowly her mouth formed into a round O, and leaning still nearer to Baree, she whispered:

"It will be deep—and sweet tonight. Ninga—yes—we will go!"

She called to him softly as she slipped on her wet moccasins and followed the creek into the forest. A hundred yards from the open she came to the edge of a pool. It was deep and full tonight, three times as big as it had been before the storm. She could hear the gurgle and inrush of water. On its ruffled surface the stars shone. For a moment or two she stood poised on a rock with the cool depths half a dozen feet below her. Then she flung back her hair and shot like a slim white arrow through the starlight.

Baree saw her go. He heard the plunge of her body. For half an hour he lay flat and still, close to the edge of the pool, and watched her. Once she was gone a long time. He whined. He knew she was not like the beaver and the otter, and he was filled with an immense relief when she came up.

So their first night passed—storm, the cool, deep pool, the big fire; and later, when the Willow's clothes and the blanket had dried, a few hours' sleep. At dawn they returned to the cabin. It was a cautious approach. There was no smoke coming from the chimney. The door was closed. Pierrot and Bush McTaggart were gone.

Chapter VIII

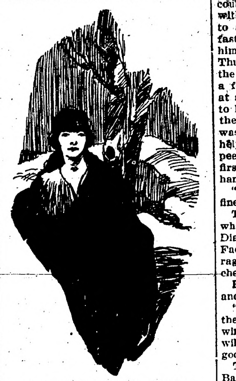
It was the beginning of August—the Flying-up Moon—when Pierrot returned from Lac Bain, and in three days more it would be the Willow's seventeenth birthday. He brought back with him many things for Nepeese—ribbons for her hair, real shoes, which she wore at times like the two English women at Nelson House, and chief glory of all, some wonderful red cloth for a dress. In the three winters she had spent at the Mission these women had made much of Nepeese. They had taught her to sew as well as to spell and read and pray, and at times there came to the Willow a compelling desire to do as they did.

So for three days Nepeese worked hard on her new dress and on her birthday she stood before Pierrot in a fashion that took his breath away. She had piled her hair in great glowing masses and coils on the crown of her head, as Yvonne, the younger of the English women, had taught her, and in the rich jet of it had half buried a vivid sprig of the crimson fire-flower. Under this, and the glow in her eyes, and the red flush of her lips and cheeks came the wonderful red dress, fitted to the slim and sinuous beauty of her form—as the style had been two winters ago at Nelson House. And under the dress, which reached just below the knees—Nepeese had quite forgotten the proper length, or else her material had run out—came the coup de maitre of her toilet, real stockings and the wonderful shoes with high heels! She was a vision before which the gods of the forest might have felt their hearts stop beating. Pierrot turned her round and round without a word, but smiling; but when she left him, followed by Baree, and limping a little in the tightness of her shoes, the smile faded from his face, leaving it cold and staring.

"Mon Dieu," he whispered to himself in French, with a thought that was like a sharp stab at his heart, "she is not of her mother's blood—non. It is French. She is—yes—like an angel."

There was a change in Pierrot. During the three days of her dressmaking Nepeese had been quite too excited to notice this change, and Pierrot had tried to keep it from her. He had been away ten days on the trip to Lac Bain, and he brought back to Nepeese the joyous news that M'sieu McTaggart was very sick with pechipoo—the blood poison—news that made the Willow clap her hands and laugh happily. But he knew that the Factor would get well, and that he would come again to their cabin on the Gray Loon. And when next time he came—

It was when he was thinking of this that his face grew cold and hard, and his eyes burned. And he was thinking of it on this her birthday, even as her laughter floated to him like a song. Dieu, in spite of her seventeen years, she was nothing but a child—a baby! She could not guess his horrible visions. And the dread of awakening her for all time from that beautiful childhood kept him from telling her the whole truth so that she might have understood fully and completely. Non, it should not be that. His soul beat with a great and gentle love. He, Pierrot De Quesne, would do the watching. And she should laugh and sing and play—and have no share in the black forebodings that had come to spoil his life.



"I Am Not Going, Mon Pere!"

On this day there came up from the south MacDonald, the government map-maker. He was gray and grizzled, with a great, free laugh and a clean heart. Two days he remained with Pierrot. He told Nepeese of his daughters at home, of their mother, whom he worshiped more than anything else on earth—and before he went on in his quest of the last timber line of Banksian pine, he took pictures of the Willow as he had first seen her on her birthday: her hair piled in glossy coils and masses, her red dress, the high-heeled shoes. He carried the negatives on with him, promising Pierrot that he would get a picture back in some way. Thus fate works in its strange and apparently innocent ways as it spins its webs of tragedy.

* * * * * * *

For many weeks after this there followed tranquil days on the Gray Loon. They were wonderful days for Baree. At first he was suspicious of Pierrot. After a little he tolerated him, and at last accepted him as a part of the cabin—and Nepeese. It was the Willow whose shadow he became. Pierrot noted the attachment with the deepest satisfaction.

"Ah, in a few months more, if he should leap at the throat of M'sieu the Factor," he said to himself one day.

In September, when he was six months old, Baree was almost as large as Gray Wolf—big-boned, long-fanged, with a deep chest, and jaws that could already crack a bone as if it were a stick. He was with Nepeese whenever and wherever she moved.

It was late in August when Baree saw the first of his kind outside of Kazan and Gray Wolf. During the summer Pierrot allowed his dogs to run at large on a small island in the center of a lake two or three miles away, and twice a week he netted fish for them. On one of these trips Nepeese accompanied him and took Baree with her. Pierrot carried his long caribou-gut whip. He expected a fight. But there was none. Baree joined the pack in their rush for fish, and ate with them. This pleased Pierrot more than ever.

"He will make a great sledge-dog," he chuckled. "It is best to leave him for a week with the pack, ma Nepeese."

Reluctantly Nepeese gave her consent. While the dogs were still at their fish, they started homeward. Their canoe had stolen well out before Baree discovered the trick they had played on him. Instantly he leaped into the water and swam after them—and the Willow helped him into the canoe.

Early in September a passing Indian brought Pierrot word of Bush McTaggart. The Factor had been very sick. He had almost died from the blood poison, but he was well now. With the first exhilarating tang of autumn in the air a new dread oppressed Pierrot. But at present he said nothing of what was in his mind to Nepeese. The Willow had almost forgotten the Factor from Lac Bain, for the glory and thrill of wilderness autumn was in her blood.

Most of Nepeese's hours she spent in training Baree for the sledge. She began with a babiche string and a stick. It was a whole day before she could induce Baree to drag this stick without turning at every other step to snap and growl at it. Then she fastened another length of babiche to him, and made him drag two sticks. Thus little by little she trained him to the sledge-harness, until at the end of a fortnight he was tugging heroically at anything she had a mind to fasten to him. Pierrot brought home two of the dogs from the island, and Baree was put into training with these, and helped to drag the empty sledge. Nepeese was delighted. On the day the first light snow fell she clapped her hands and cried to Pierrot:

"By midwinter I will have him the finest dog in the pack, mon pere!"

This was the time for Pierrot to say what was in his mind. He smiled. Diantre—would not that beast the Factor fall into the very devil of a rage when he found how he had been cheated! And yet—

He tried to make his voice quiet and commonplace.

"I am going to send you down to the school at Nelson House again this winter, ma cherie," he said. "Baree will help draw you down on the first good snow."

The Willow was tying a knot in Baree's babiche, and she rose slowly to her feet and looked at Pierrot.

"I am not going, mon pere!"

It was the first time Nepeese had ever said that to Pierrot—in just that way. It thrilled him. And he could scarcely face the look in her eyes. He was not good at bluffing. Nepeese did not wait for him to gather speech.

"I am not going!" she repeated with even greater finality, and bent again over Baree.

With a shrug of his shoulders Pierrot watched her. After all, was he not glad? Would his heart not have turned sick if she had been happy at the thought of leaving him? He moved to her side and with great gentleness laid a hand on her glossy head. Up from under it the Willow smiled at him. Between them they heard the click of Baree's jaws as he rested his muzzle on the Willow's arm. For the first time in weeks the world seemed suddenly filled with sunshine for Pierrot. When he went back to the cabin he held his head higher. Nepeese would not leave him! He laughed softly. He rubbed his hands together. His fear of the Factor from Lac Bain was gone. From the cabin door he looked back at Nepeese and Baree.

"The saints be blessed!" he murmured. "Now—now—it is Pierrot Du Quesne who knows what to do!"

Brains Minor Factor in Financial Success

If you set out in this world to make money, your success will depend more on your personality than on intelligence or ability as a scholor. And a sense of humor won't help you so very much, either.

What you will need to stock up on are the traits usually displayed in abundance by self-made men of so many "success" stories; aggressiveness, enthusiasm, accuracy in work, and self-reliance.

A study of the mathematical relation between personality and income has been made at Purdue university, and the traits that go hand in hand with money making are listed in order of their importance. Typical college men, who were graduated from engineering school five years ago, were taken as subjects for the study.

Originality and address are of more monetary importance in personality than neatness and sincerity, the investigation indicates. Reasoning ability stands twelfth in the series of 23 personal traits correlated with income. Moral habits are the last thing in personality makeup that has any connection with financial success.—Kansas City Star.

A Common Wish

We often wish the Christian spirit didn't feel it necessary to bawl out anyone that doesn't agree with it on all points quite so hard.—Ohio State Journal.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

YEARS ago when I migrated to New York from the Chicago loop I hung up my hat and unpacked my suitcase in a small hotel. And while I had many acquaintances in New York I didn't know where to find them. The names of the streets and the telephone exchanges were all new to me and when an occasion arose to make a memorandum of a name, address or 'phone number while conversing on the telephone, I committed the unpardonable offense so prevalent among thoughtless, busy people of making notations on the wall paper near the instrument. This delinquency I had just naturally acquired because of my gypsy habit of being continually on the move.

One evening I returned to my room to dress for dinner at the home of someone I was most anxious to visit and found that in my absence painters and paperhangers had been busy removing every vestige of a memorandum while redecorating the walls. Talk about being sunk without warning! Gone was the telephone number and street address of my prospective hostess and as she was not listed in the book my predicament was acute. It was exasperating but it cured me of using the wall paper as a memo pad.

While in the hospital recently I had a somewhat similar experience. I had great difficulty in keeping letters containing addresses and other information. After I once laid them down on the table near my bed I could never tell when I would meet them again. Nurses are no respecters of routes and numbers and when they come in with dust cloth they sweep everything before them.

I tried having a pencil and pad attached to the head of my bed, but they were so hard to reach that it involved ringing for a nurse every time I wanted to copy an address. So I conceived the idea of making notes on the cast which encased my diaphragm and approached my chin. Various and sundry addresses, telephone numbers and other data did I commit to it until the day the doctor decided my cast should be reinforced at the particular spot where it was most convenient to scribble.

They trundled me into the composing room, as the operating room should be called, and there swathed me in long, wide gooey bandages, wet with plaster of paris. When I came to I found I had lost Trixie Friganza's route, a week of Blanche Ring's one-night stands, Zelda Sears' telephone number, three names of books I wanted, four words I meant to look up and three ideas for stories. And this wasn't one of them.

The singer had just finished a most pathetic ballad about "Down in Georgia," and Edwin Franko Goodman, the celebrated bandmaster turned his face away to hide his pain.

"Excuse me," said his neighbor at the concert, "you seem much affected. Are you a Georgian?"

"No," the bandmaster replied. "I am a musician."

◆

"Nurse in Syracuse Breaks a Vertebrae While Combing Her Hair," said the headline last week. That's a wise crack. Give her credit. Wish I had thought of that one. It beats the excuse I have for mine being broken. And say, girls, isn't that a peach of an argument in favor of bobbed hair?

Below is a bit of poetry in prose, sent to me by an anonymous contributor. It is the sort of thing I wish I might have written myself, so perfectly it is fashioned to carry thoughts I have always held and treasured, and at times wanted to express:

"Do not keep the alabaster boxes of your love and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead. Fill their lives with sweetness, speaking approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them and while their hearts can be thrilled and made happier. The kind things you mean to say when they are gone, say before they go. The flowers you mean to send for those coffins, send to brighten and sweeten their homes before they leave them. If my friends have alabaster boxes laid away full of fragrant perfumes of sympathy and affection, which they intend to break over my body, I would much rather they would bring them out in my weary and troubled hours, and open them, that I may be refreshed and cheered while I need it. I would rather have a plain coffin without a flower, a funeral without an eulogy, than a life without the sweetness of love and sympathy. Let us learn to anoint our friends beforehand for their burial. Post-mortem kindness does not cheer the burdened spirit, flowers on the coffin cast no fragrance backward over the weary way."—Anon.

◆

We needn't worry about the death of chivalry, I have been informed by William Faversham, just as long as the man offers the woman the first light. A surer test of a gallant nature, I believe, is to offer his last cigarette.

The press notices inform me that a producer is soon to try "Dear Relations," a comedy. If most of us tried our "dear relations," they undoubtedly would be found guilty.

Read of Other Women Who Found Health

Brooklyn, New York.—Mrs. G. Hegmann of 35 Central Ave., was in a run-down condition and could not do her housework. She could not sleep at night. Her story is not an unusual one. Thousands of women find themselves in a similar condition at some time in their lives. "I found your advertisement in my letter box," wrote Mrs. Hegmann, "and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and got relief." Mrs. Hegmann also took Lydia E. Pinkham's Herb Medicine and Lydia E. Pinkham's Pills for Constipation, with good results. She says, "I am recommending your medicines to all I know who have symptoms the same as mine, and to others whom I think it will help. You may use my statement as a testimonial, and I will answer any letters sent to me by women who would like information regarding your medicines."

There are women in your state—perhaps in your town—who have written letters similar to this one telling how much Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped them.

The Pinkham Medicine Company, Lynn, Mass., will gladly furnish other women with these names upon request.

How often do we hear someone say, "John Brown has more luck than I have, that is why he gets along," etc., or "Smith was born under a lucky star, he cannot help but succeed," and similar remarks.

If you will take the trouble to investigate the business methods of these lucky Joneses, and Smiths, you will find that 99 times out of a hundred it is Pluck and not Luck that has made their business a success.

Never in the history of the creamery have the 100-lb butterfat patrons numbered nearly 90 for the month of April. This is proof that our individual patron is making his herd produce milk without green grass, as it used to be some few years back. Secondary proof is that our patrons are realizing that they must feed cows that are giving milk enough to give them a profit instead of putting it on their backs in the form of fat. A great deal has been said about these unprofitable cows, yet, in my opinion, too much cannot be said, so let us find out where our boarder cows are before we sell any more cows. Every farmer has some good cows and some not so good. Yet there is a great deal of difference in cows. Some give milk enough for the year to make 1 lb butterfat per day, and some that take 3 days milking to make 1 lb butterfat. We have some of both kinds right here in our own community.

Primary election comes June 21. No one who refuses to vote on that day without a good reason can say that he or she is a RED-BLOODED AMERICAN CITIZEN. If you go to the polls and vote, you have a right to comment one way or the other regarding how the affairs in our nation, state, and county is being handled. On the other hand, if you fail to vote, why should you do any kicking when you didn't do your duty as an American citizen.

Quite often the man of the house goes to the polls and forgets that his wife should go with him. This is very wrong, so this time make sure that everyone in your family that is eligible to vote get to the polls and exercise the rights given to them. Let us show by voting that the people in our community are proud of being citizens.

HOLT SCHOOL CLOSED FRIDAY

The Holt School closed Friday after a successful term under the supervision of Superintendent A. R. Hudson. We are sorry to state that Mr. Hudson will not be with us next year, but he will be able to see us often as he is going to be up at Roosevelt the coming year. Three of the other teachers will come back in the fall for a second term.

Three more teachers have been hired so our school will have six teachers next year.

Satesdals-Laget to Be Held at T.R.Falls

Big Program Thursday and Friday, June 17 and 18.

Residents of this community, who themselves or their forefathers came here from Satesdalen, Norway, are planning to attend the annual celebration of Satesdals-Laget in Thief River Falls next Thursday and Friday, June 17 and 18. An interesting program has been arranged, beginning at 2 p. m. on Thursday in the city auditorium. There will be talks by prominent speakers, music by leading Norwegian violinists and singers, demonstrations of "Halling" and "Springer" dances, etc. A banquet with typical Satesdal dishes is being arranged for Thursday evening at 6:30 o'clock, the feature Friday evening to be the showing a ten-reel moving picture film from Norway, including many scenes from Satesdalen, by Carsten Woll, the famous Norwegin singer, who will sing many Norwegian folk melodies. Anyone interested may attend the programs, according to Bj. Bjornaraa of Wanka, president of the organization, and O. Neset of Thief River Falls, secretary.

BIG TROUT CAUGHT IN LAKE OF WOODS

Winnipeg, June 7.—John A. Forlong, Winnipeg financier and sportsman, brought to the city Monday from the Lake of the Woods a lake trout weighing 37 pounds, the biggest lake trout taken in the Lake of the Woods in many years.

The trout was caught with a spoon, steel rod and a 20-pound line after a 40-minute fight put up by the trout.

Beef Cattle Train Coming to County

Will Be A Regular Short Course On Wheels.

Minnesota's Better Beef Cattle special train—a regular beef cattle school or short course on wheels—will make extended stops on June 15 at Warren and Thief River Falls. The train will be operated jointly by the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, and Soo line, co-operating with the Minnesota Agricultural College, the packing industries, breeders of livestock and community organizations.

Believing that the beef producing business has partially turned the corner at last and that better days are ahead of it in the immediate future, the promotors of the beef cattle train will try to give cattle raisers a better understanding of economic conditions affecting beef cattle production; of that particular type, conformation, and finish of beef animals that the consuming public demands, and, further, to drive home the fact that this type, conformation, and finish can only be obtained thru the introduction of good blood and by proper management and intelligent feeding. Another purpose in mind is to give out additional knowledge of present-day beef cattle breed types.

The train will consist of three baggage cars for the animals, feed and equipment; a flat-car which will be used for displaying the livestock when required; a day coach, diner, and sleeper. The train personnel will be composed of university live-stock men, railroad representatives, boys' livestock club members, herdsmen, and caretakers.

Announcement

TO THE PUBLIC:

I hereby announce that I am a candidate for nomination for Sheriff at the Primaries to be held on June 21st, and solicit your support and vote.

If nominated and elected, I promise to fulfill the duties of the office to the best of my ability and shall always endeavor to preserve the public peace and render every assistance possible in protecting the interests of the people of the County, both in a civil and criminal way.

I have been deputy sheriff for several years and if elected sheriff I shall perform the duties of that office with the same zeal and impartiality I have tried to show as deputy, and pledge myself to devote all my time to the office. I want to give every one a square deal, if elected, and shall appreciate not only your vote but your influence.

Yours very truly,
JOHN P. BORDEWICH

On Track of a Cure for Diabetes

UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD

A new clew in a treatment for diabetes has been found in experiments on dogs, Drs. A. C. Ivy and J. I. Farrell of the Northwestern university medical school have announced. The surgeons said they had successfully transplanted a portion of the pancreas into the mammary glands of the dog and it was found that the pancreatic transplant functioned to such an extent in producing a sufficient amount of insulin that diabetes would not occur when the remainder of the pancreas was removed. The photograph shows, left to right, Dr. A. C. Ivy and Dr. J. I. Farrell. The dog in the center was experimented on.

Crops of 1926 Tough Problem

Railroads Plan Ahead for Gigantic Movement in Farm Products.

Omaha, Neb.—Western farmers and western railroads are running a race to see which can swamp the other. The farmers expect to harvest millions of bushels of grain, and the railroads are spending millions of dollars getting ready to handle one of the very biggest farm crops in their experience.

Nebraska is promising between 50,000,000 and 70,000,000 bushels of wheat for the railroads to handle; Kansas is assuring them of something like 200,000,000 bushels, Oklahoma expects to harvest around 40,000,000 bushels, and Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota will swell the total by hundreds of millions.

In corn, Nebraska will furnish the railroads around 200,000,000 bushels, minus that portion of the crop which will be eaten by Nebraska hogs and cattle, which, in their turn, will provide big traffic for the railroads; Iowa is looking forward to something like 350,000,000 to 400,000,000 bushels; Kansas will produce near to 100,000,000, and additional millions will be raised by other western states.

Oats Also Considerable Item.

As for oats, some 400,000,000 to 500,000,000 bushels can be counted on from these western states.

And then there is the fruit from California, Oregon, Idaho, Washington, Colorado, Nebraska; potatoes from Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho, Iowa and Kansas; sugar beets and sugar from Nebraska, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, etc., live stock from all these states, and the general production, including dairying, as well.

Added to this is the tremendous traffic which is shipped into the great trans-Mississippi country — automobiles, farm implements, and the thousand and one articles which the westerners must buy and the railroads to transport them.

As soon as the railroads saw all these prospects for big crops under way, they started their preparations to take care of the immense traffic which would be forthcoming.

The Wabash railroad must have seen an immense increase in the automobile business, for that railroad alone ordered 2,000 extra automobile freight cars in December, and these cars are just now being delivered, ready for the spring business. The Wabash already owned about 6,000 automobile cars.

Coast Fruit Traffic Gaining.

A big increase in the fruit traffic from the Pacific coast is foreseen by the Pacific Fruit express, the fruit-carrying line owned by Union Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads jointly. In January the Pacific Fruit express ordered 5,048 refrigerator cars to add to its already big fleet of refrigerators. These cars will be delivered in time for the fruit crop this year.

The Santa Fe railroad has under order 1,200 refrigerators for this year's fruit trade, and the Northwestern Refrigerator line has just ordered 1,000 of the same class cars for the 1926 business.

Since last November, western railroads have ordered 12,600 freight cars for this year's crop movement. One thousand of these went to the Union Pacific, 1,000 to the Burlington, 1,600 to the Southern Pacific, 2,500 to the Missouri Pacific, 1,000 to the Northern Pacific, 1,700 to the Frisco route, 1,000 to the Santa Fe, 600 to the Soo line, 2,000 to the Wabash, and the remainder to scattering lines.

For the 1926 trade there have been so far ordered by western railroads 1,000 gondola cars, 500 hoppers, 250 stock cars and 500 general-service cars.

In the way of motive power, the western railroads have ordered 155 locomotives of various types for use this year. The Missouri Pacific leads the list with 55.

Big Union Pacific Engines.

The Union Pacific has designed and is having built ten huge three-cylinder locomotives, each more than 100 feet long and capable of hauling a train of 100 loaded cars across the mountains from Cheyenne to Ogden at a rate of 50 miles an hour. This big "Union Pacific type" is the biggest departure in locomotives in 25 years.

The Nebraska wheat crop alone will fill 1,000 trains of 50 cars each, with each car loaded with 1,200 bushels, while the Nebraska corn crop will load 2,600 trains of 50 cars each, 1,500 bushels to the car.

Prospects now are that every one of the freight cars the western railroads have ordered will be filled time after time by these western farmers when their 1926 wheat, corn, oats, live stock, potatoes, fruit, sugar beets and other farm products get under way to market, and will be filled time and time again on the return with automobiles, agricultural implements, furniture and clothing, and with the thousand and one things the West has to buy from "farther East."

Dying Artist Gives Picture as Wedding Gift

Los Angeles, Cal.—Municipal Judge Wood received a bequest from Ivan Kalmykoff, dead Russian artist, in lieu of a marriage fee. It was one of Kalmykoff's paintings, now worth, it is said, several times the amount usually paid for such service.

About a year ago, Kalmykoff and his fiancee appeared before Justice Wood, and explained they wished to wed, but that every cent was needed for other expenses.

"Never mind," said Justice Wood. "I'll marry you, anyhow."

Departing, Kalmykoff assured the magistrate he would repay him in some way, some time, but it was not until recently that Judge Wood heard from him again.

Sigmund S'renco, an attorney, appeared in Justice Wood's chambers with the painting and said it was Kalmykoff's dying request that the picture be presented to the jurist.

"He was getting a reputation rapidly when he passed away," said S'renco, "and the prices of his work now are advancing at a rapid rate. The small painting could have been sold for about $25 at the time of his death, and if you wish to dispose of it now you will get more."

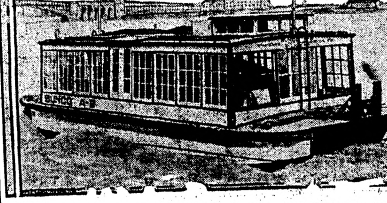
Novel Type of River Tugboat



In the Mississippi river at St. Louis can be seen this strange craft, a new idea in river tugboats. Its present power is gasoline, later to be changed to a Diesel engine. It moves either way with equal facility and has great power and is especially suited to handle barge units in very shallow water.

TEACH CHILDREN HOW TO PLAY SAFELY IN SUMMER

National Safety Council Starts Campaign to Reduce Number of Accidents.

Chicago.—Community safety councils in 65 American cities are going to impress upon parents the importance of teaching their children how to play safely during the present summer, C. B. Scott, president of the National Safety council, announced. Efforts will be made to reduce the number of child accidents which during 1925 resulted in the deaths of 21,000 boys and girls. More than 7,000 youngsters were killed on the streets and highways and at least 30 times as many injured, stated President Scott. Child deaths from burns last year totaled nearly 5,000. The remainder were the result of falls, poison, asphyxiation, suffocation and miscellaneous causes.

"The chief cause of all accidents is carelessness or thoughtlessness," declared President Scott. "A great many, probably a majority of child accidents, are due wholly or in part to the thoughtlessness or ignorance of the child. To stop these accidents we must not only have law enactment and enforcement and more careful driving on the part of motorists but we must also instruct the children—not simply tell them to 'be careful' but make them understand the hazards of modern life and how to avoid them. An educational campaign of this kind will be conducted by our 65 affiliated community safety councils whose officers will stage special meetings for both parents and teachers, deliver appropriate radio talks and circulate timely literature.

"During the present school term millions of children have been receiving safety instruction in both parochial and public schools. We are going to continue this kind of work during the summer months when we aim to have safety talks delivered at parks and playgrounds, public swimming places, motion picture theaters, etc., where children assemble during vacation days. Constructive work of this character should result in a decrease in the number of child accidents."

High Cost of Being Born Limits U. S. Birth Rate

Berkeley, Calif.—The high cost of being born is partly responsible for the declining birth rate in the United States, a state economic research organization here has reported.

In grandmother's time one could arrive in this world for less than $100; today the organization estimates the cost at $541.95. Some babies cost even $1,000 or $1,500, the organization said it has learned.

Back on Job

Ossining, N. Y.—Sing Sing's theatrical director is back on the job after a vacation of thirteen months; returned to a cell for violation of parole.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

HUMAN nature is human nature, in a prison as well as out of it, and often the very rigor of the regime stirs into life qualities that have lain dormant until then. A communication from Nell McConlog, connected with the Prison Welfare association, related that they had received from the inmates of one of the state penitentiaries a request for nursery stories and Mother Goose rhymes. These works are not usually considered "best sellers" in prison circles and the members of the association started a quiet investigation.

This is what they learned: One of the "paying guests" of the institution—he was paying for having inspired too much confidence in a credulous "rube"—had a wife and baby "out there," and not a day passed without an exchange of letters between the convict and his family. By its mother the child has been brought up to believe that "daddy" was in the hospital. Each of the father's letters contained a fairy story for the little one. One day the story teller ran short of material and in desperation appealed to one of his prison mates to help him. Assistance was forthcoming and the details of the father's predicament spread from cell to cell.

Every one of the prisoner's fellow-passengers on the train to Straightville, who had any imagination or could spin a yarn, immediately took it upon himself to see that "Three Card Sam's" little girl had her daily fairy tale, even if "Cinderella," "Puss in Boots," "Jack and the Beanstalk," and all the other classics had to be rewritten from a dozen angles to get it for her.

Although John T. Murray, the agile comedian, is one of the most popular fun-makers on Broadway, I remember him when he was getting $35 a week with a small road company that started out from Toronto, Canada.

The truth of the matter is that he was given a contract for that magnificent salary, but collecting it was another matter. The management did pay his hotel bills, but when it came to a matter of pocket change, there was a different story. As time went on the young comedian, stage manager and master of transportation sorely needed a haircut. But his appeals for cash were in vain. Finally, in desperation, he shook his flowing locks at the close-fisted manager and demanded enough coin of the realm to get it trimmed.

"My boy, my boy," answered the manager in his most unctuous tones, "that will never do. If you have your hair cut, you won't look like an actor."

The old adage that one good one makes up for several bad ones still holds true. It was proved to my satisfaction by an incident that occurred during my stay at St. Vincent's hospital in New York.

A man who had a private room, special nurse, many telephone calls and other incidentals, went away leaving a bad check in payment, but not long afterward was apprehended and held for judgment. On the same day that this cheat was arrested a neatly but not expensively dressed young man called at the hospital and asked to see the sister in charge.

"I just came in to settle an old board bill that I have owed a year," he said.

Upon being referred to the accounting department he was informed that he owed nothing as he had been in a free bed.

"Well," he inquired, "what would the bill have been if it hadn't been free?"

A statement for $110 was given him and he paid it out of a roll of bills amounting to $122. He then gave ten out of the remaining twelve dollars to the sister "for smokes for the fellows," he said, adding that $2 was enough to get him back to the ship where he was employed as stoker.

A great many people pray for things and then get discouraged because they do not get what they want at once. They feel that God has overlooked them and they let the matter drop. Apparently they forget that God is very busy and has a lot of things to think about. It is up to each one of us to follow up our prayers. If we just pray and let it go without helping it along, how can we expect results? We have to help ourselves in earthly enterprises. Why not in prayers?

◆

I had no idea cereals were so tasty until I noted the difference between the kind we get from the grocer and those that come direct and fresh from the packer. They might even have pleased Burgess Johnson, who declared in "Life" that if a wheat biscuit reminded him of anything else on earth he would put that anything else out of his life forever.

◆

Florence Flinn gave the new styles, as illustrated in the advanced catalogues, the once-over. "I wonder," she ruminated, "whether we shall be choked or tripped by the next new waistline."

IT WAS A MATTER OF RELATIONS

By DONA REED

(©, 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)

"WELL?" questioned Reba, as Sadie opened the door of the top-floor back that she shared with her sister.

"The judge said if I don't marry Morris by June 25 I got to give him back the ring," she reported listlessly.

"He did, did he!" raged Reba. "Don't let him scare you. You can get married when you feel like it! A fine feller, Morris is, bringing you to court!"

Sadie's dark eyes flashed. "Morris is all right," she asserted stoutly. "I don't blame him for getting tired of waiting."

Reba looked at her anxiously. "You ain't thinking of marrying him yet, Sadie? You know how it'll look if you get married first—like nobody wants me. Mr. Mandel won't want me then, neither." She suddenly burst into tears. "Nobody—does—want—me!"

Sadie went over to her sister, patted her hands and kissed her. "There, now, what're you crying for? You know I wouldn't get married before you do. And you're crazy when you talk that way. Twice I saw Mr. Mendel today and he asked for you both times. I think maybe he wants to take you out again this Sunday."

Reba smiled through her tears and blushed faintly. Mr. Mendel owned a gents' furnishing store and appeared rather interested in the elder Miss Weisman. It was three years since Mr. Mendel and Reba went out for the first time, yet his interest never seemed to rise to the proper pitch. Sometimes Reba would note an unusual friendliness in his manner, but after these occasions, he did not appear again for three weeks, evidently hoping that in the interval, Reba would forget his rash cordiality. She never forgot, but these intervals of silence served their purpose and killed any flaring hopes she may have entertained.

Sadie was disgusted with Mr. Mendel's noncommital attitude. Although Morris did not know anything about it, Sadie and Morris were waiting upon Mr. Mendel. Sadie often raged at him in secret. She hated the two-by-four furnished room which she and Reba shared. She hated the dingy office where she kept the books. She wanted to marry Morris and keep house for him and darn his socks, but she daren't let him know how she felt—all because of that cheap-skate, Mr. Mendel, who was afraid to get married!

That evening, Sadie and Morris walked disconsolately through the park, oblivious of the new moon that shone through the swaying trees, oblivious of the soft breeze that played through their hair. The light of an electric lamp caught the light of the diamond on Sadie's finger and kindled a thousand small fires, as she absentmindedly moved the ring back and forth with her thumb. Morris frowned and drew her down on a bench beside him.

"Sadie," he said desperately, "you waited until the last day, but you'll marry me tomorrow, won't you. My boss said he'd let me have a week for a honeymoon whenever I wanted it, and Reba could look for a flat for us while we're away!"

He was so eager and so dear to her that way that she brushed a light kiss on his cheek. He kissed her hungrily and she broke away, her voice tremulous. "No, Morris. When I get married I'll pick my own flat. I can't marry you yet. You might as well take the ring tonight." She slipped it off and put it in his hand while she strove to keep back the tears.

"No, no," he said, his voice broken. "You keep it Sadie-girl. What'll I do with it? Even if you don't want to marry me—"

"I do! I do!" She covered her face with her hands and cried bitterly on Morris' shoulder.

"You want to marry me and yet you won't marry me. If you wanted to, you would!"

"No, I can't," she sobered. "How many times must I tell you I can't get married before Reba! She's been too good. She kept house for papa. She brought me up. It would hurt her if I got married first, and it wouldn't be right."

"But Sadie, suppose she don't ever get married!" he said, falling back upon an old argument.

"Oh, she will. If Mr. Mendel wasn't so stupid, he'd see what a good wife she'd make."

"Mr. Mendel?" This was the first time Sadie had intimated that Reba was looking upon Mr. Mendel as a possible husband. Morris had encountered him on two occasions when he waited to take Reba to the "movies," but Morris had never thought of a match between the pair. "You think he wants to marry her?"

"How should I know! For three years now he takes her to the 'movies' and looks at her as if he wanted to ask her something, but don't. He makes me sick!"

"The poor fish!" exclaimed Morris, catching her indignation. "Sadie-girl, I'm going to find out what's the matter with him!"

"You better not, Morris. That's why I didn't tell you before. You might make a botch of it, and then he won't marry her at all."

"Sadie, I ask you, did I ever make a botch of anything?" he boasted. "You leave it to me."

Sadie smiled wanly and dried her eyes. "Just the same, you better keep the ring yet."

Morris determined to have it out with Mr. Mendel right away. He was in a high state of indignation when he entered Mr. Mendel's haberdashery the next evening. When Mr. Mendel recognized him he exclaimed jocularly. "At last he comes to buy his wedding outfit!" and came out from behind the counter to greet him.

"I didn't come to buy anything," replied Morris, ignoring Mr. Mendel's outstretched hand. "I came to find out when you're going to buy your wedding outfit."

Mr. Mendel thought at first that Morris was being funny, but, no; there was no joke in his scowl or the angry look in his eyes.

The smile on Mr. Mendel's face faded. "I? Why, I ain't engaged!" he cried.

"Oh, you're not," retorted Morris. "Well, isn't it about time you were? Are you going to marry Reba Weisman or aren't you?"

"What business is it of yours? What right have you to come and make this racket in my store? You get out! I don't see you marrying that good-for-nothing kid sister of hers."

"That what?" shouted Morris.

"That good-for—"

Before he knew exactly what had happened, Mr. Mendel received a crashing blow under the chin—a blow that sent him sprawling. Sputtering with anger, he picked himself up and started towards Morris who caught hold of his wrists in a vise-like grip.

"You apologize," commanded Morris.

Mr. Mendel hastily considered his chances of beating Morris in a fight, felt the soreness of his jaw and deemed it expedient to do as he was bid.

"I didn't mean nothing," he argued. "Sadie's all right, only she makes me mad. If it wasn't for her, I'd have married Reba long ago."

"What has Sadie got to do with you marrying Reba?"

"Do you think I'll have Reba fussing over that sister of hers in my house? My wife should fuss over me. I don't want no relations around. I wait and wait for Sadie to get married but she don't know what she wants—that girl."

Morris sudenly dropped into a chair and doubled up with laughter.

"Why do you laugh, you big fool you?"

Mr. Mendel immediately regretted losing his temper. He edged away, expecting to receive another crashing blow, but Morris merely continued to roar.

"You won't marry Reba because of Sadie," he cried, "and Sadie won't marry me because of y—she doesn't want to leave Reba! You blame me for laughing?"

"You mean to say that if I marry Reba, Sadie will marry you right away and won't live with us?"

"Of course—you big fool, you!" and Morris laughed again—this time with the joy of realizing it.

Mr. Mendel grabbed his hat. "You stay in the store, huh, till I go over and see Reba."

He dashed out without waiting for an answer. Morris went to the door and watched him running down the street—one hand upraised to hold on his hat, the other nursing his injured jaw.

"A fine brother-in-law!" exclaimed Morris, as he gazed with approval at his closed fist.

Blind Keenly Feel Sense of Isolation

The most trying part of being blind—stone-blind, as it is popularly called—is the complete and irremediable sense of isolation. Sight is probably the sense which means more to us than any other. Through the eyes we get our ideas of the world around us and of size and relation of one thing to another—color and light and shade, the glory of the day, the beauty of a moonlight night.

A great part of our communication with other people is carried on by the eyes; sometimes alone—more often as an adjunct of speech and hearing. Normally our senses function together so harmoniously that we do not stop to think of how they act, or their interdependent relations. We just use them.

But it is a strange sensation to stand up in the center of a crowd of people—to know that hundreds of men and women are around you, some of them almost touching you, and yet you cannot see them. It is a nerve-racking experience at first, even though one is conscious of the real friendliness of the people.

This probably is one of the sensations which come only to those who lose their sight in later years, and not to those who were always blind. To such as have never known vision, the world and all they know of it is a world of their own in which they live, move, and function normally. They find nothing strange in it, for they have been accustomed to it all their lives, and to no different conditions.—J. Macrae, in the Strand Magazine.

Chapter IX

Back to Lac Bain, late in September, came MacDonald the map-maker. For ten days Gregson, the investigating agent, had been Bush McTaggart's guest at the post, and twice in that time it had come into Marie's mind to creep upon him while he slept and kill him. The Factor himself paid little attention to her now, a fact which would have made her happy if it had not been for Gregson. He was enraptured with the wild, sinuous beauty of the Cree girl, and McTaggart, without jealousy, encouraged him. He was tired of Marie.

McTaggart told Gregson this. He wanted to get rid of her, and if he—Gregson—could possibly take her on with him it would be a great favor. He explained why. A little later, when the deep snow came, he was going to bring the daughter of Pierrot Du Quesne to the Post. In the rottenness of their brotherhood he told of his visit, of the manner of his reception, and of the incident at the chasm. In spite of all this, he assured Gregson Pierrot's girl would soon be at Lac Bain.

It was at this time that MacDonald came. He remained only one night, and without knowing that he was adding fuel to a fire already dangerously blazing, he gave the photograph he had taken of Nepeese to the Factor. It was a splendid picture.

"If you can get it down to that girl some day I'll be mightily obliged," he said to McTaggart. "I promised her one. Her father's name is Du Quesne—Pierrot Du Quesne. You probably know them. And the girl—"

His blood warmed as he described to McTaggart how beautiful she was that day in her red dress, which had taken black in the photograph. He did not guess how near the boiling point McTaggart's blood was.

The next day MacDonald started for Norway House. McTaggart did not show Gregson the picture. He kept it to himself, and at night, under the glow of his lamp, he looked at it with thoughts that filled him with a growing resolution. There was but one way. The scheme had been in his mind for weeks—and the picture determined him. He dared not whisper his secret even to Gregson. But it was the one way. It would give him Nepeese. Only—he must wait for the deep snows, the midwinter snows. They buried their tragedies deepest.

McTaggart was glad when Gregson followed the map-maker to Norway House. Out of courtesy he accompanied him a day's journey on his way. When he returned to the Post, Marie was gone. He was glad. He sent off a runner with a load of presents for her people, and the message: "Don't beat her. Keep her. She is free."

Along with the bustle and stir of the beginning of the trapping season McTaggart began to prepare his house for the coming of Nepeese. He knew what she liked in the way of cleanliness and a few other things. He had the log walls painted white with the lead and oil that were intended for his York boats. Certain partitions were torn down, and new ones were built; the Indian wife of his chief runner made curtains for the windows, and he confiscated a small phonograph that should have gone on to Lac la Biche. He had no doubts, and he counted the days as they passed.

Down on the Gray Loon Pierrot and Nepeese were busy at many things, so busy that at times Pierrot's fears of the Factor at Lac Bain were forgotten, and they went out of the Willow's mind entirely. It was the Red Moon, and it thrilled with the anticipation and excitement of the winter hunt. Nepeese carefully dipped a hundred traps in boiling caribou-fat mixed with beaver-grease, while Pierrot made fresh deadfalls ready for setting on his trails. When he was gone more than a day from the cabin, she was always with him.

But at the cabin there was much to do, for Pierrot, like all his Northern brotherhood, did not begin to prepare until the keen tang of autumn was in the air. There were snowshoes to be rewebbed with new babiche, there was wood to be cut in readiness for the winter storms; the cabin had to be banked, a new harness made, skinning knives sharpened and winter moccasins to be manufactured; a hundred and one affairs to be attended to.

He repaired the meat rack at the back of the cabin, where, from the beginning of cold weather until the end, would hang the haunches of deer, caribou and moose for the family larder and, when fish was scarce, the dogs' rations.

In the bustle of all this Nepeese was compelled to give less attention to Baree than during the preceding weeks. They did not play so much; they no longer swam, for with the mornings there was deep frost on the ground, and the water was turning icy cold; they no longer wandered deep in the forest after flowers and berries. For hours at a time Baree would now lie at the Willow's feet, watching her slender fingers as they weaved swiftly in and out with her snowshoe babiche; and now and then Nepeese would pause to lean over and put her hand on his head, and talk to him for a moment—sometimes in her soft Cree, sometimes in English or her father's French.

It was the Willow's voice which Baree had learned to understand, and the movement of her lips, her gesture, the poise of her body, the changing moods which brought shadow or sunlight into her face. He knew what it meant when she smiled; he shook himself, and often jumped about her in sympathetic rejoicing, when she laughed; her happiness was a part of him, a stern word from her was worse than a blow. Twice Pierrot had struck him, and twice Baree had sprung back and faced him with bared fangs and an angry snarl, the crest along his back standing up like a brush. Had one of the other dogs done this, Pierrot would have half killed him. It would have been mutiny, and the man must be master. But Baree was always safe. A touch of the Willow's hand, a word from her lips, and the crest slowly settled and the snarl went out of his throat.

Pierrot was not at all displeased.

"Dieu. I will never go so far as to try and whip that out of him," he told himself. "He is a barbarian—a wild beast—and her slave. For her he would kill."

So it came, through Pierrot himself—and without telling his reason for it—that Baree did not become a sledge dog. He was allowed his freedom, and was never tied, like the others. Nepeese was glad, but did not guess the thought that was in Pierrot's mind. To himself Pierrot chuckled. She would never know why he kept Baree always suspicious of him, even to the point of hating him. It required considerable skill and cunning on his part. With himself he reasoned:

"If I make him hate me, he will hate all men. Mey-oo! That is good."

So he looked into the future—for Nepeese.

Now the tonic-filled days and cold, frosty nights of the Red Moon brought about the big change in Baree. It was inevitable. Pierre knew that it would come, and the first night that Baree settled back on his haunches and howled up at the Red Moon Pierrot prepared Nepeese for it.

"He is a wild dog, Ma Nepeese," he said to her. "He is half wolf, and the Call will come to him strong. He will go into the forests. He will disappear at times. But we must not fasten him. He will come back. Ka, he will come back!" And he rubbed his hands in the moon-glow until his knuckles cracked.

The Call came to Baree like a thief entering slowly and cautiously into a forbidden place. He did not understand it at first. It made him nervous and uneasy, so restless that Nepeese frequently heard him whine softly in his sleep. He was waiting for something. What was it? Pierrot knew, and smiled in his inscrutable way.

And then it came. It was night, a glorious night filled with moon and stars, under which the earth was whitening with a film of frost, when they heard the first hunt-call of the wolves. Pierrot knew that at last had come that for which Baree had been waiting.

In an instant Baree had sensed it. His muscles grew taut as pieces of stretched rope as he stood up in the moonlight, facing the direction from which floated the mystery and thrill of the sound. They could hear him whining softly; and Pierrot, bending down so that he caught the light of the night properly, could see him trembling.

"It is Mee-Koo!" he said in a whisper to Nepeese.

That was it, the call of the blood that was running swift in Baree's veins—not alone the call of his species, but the call of Kazan and Gray Wolf and of his forebears for generations unnumbered. It was the voice of his people. So Pierrot had whispered, and he was right. In the golden night the Willow was waiting, for it was she who had gambled most, and it was she who must lose or win. She watched Baree as he slowly faded away, step by step, in the shadows. In a few moments more he was gone.

It was then that she stood straight, and flung back her head, with eyes that glowed in rivalry with the stars.

"Baree!" she called. "Baree! Baree! Baree!"

He must have been near the edge of the forest, for she had drawn a slow, waiting breath or two before he was back at her side. But he had come, straight as an arrow, and he whined up into her face. Nepeese put her hands to his head.

"You are right, mon pere," she said. "He will go to the wolves, but he will come back. He will never leave me for long." With one hand still on Baree's head, she pointed with the other into the pitlike blackness of the forest. "Go to them, Baree!" she whispered. "But you must come back. You must Cheamao!"

With Pierrot she went into the cabin; the door closed behind them, and Baree was alone. A choking gathered in his throat. He threw up his head. Straight above him was the Red Moon, inviting him to the thrill and mystery of the open world. The sound grew in his throat, and slowly it rose in volume until his answer was rising to the stars. In their cabin Pierrot and the Willow heard it. Pierrot shrugged his shoulders.

"He is gone," he said.

"Oui, he is gone, mon pere," replied Nepeese, peering through the window.

No longer, as in the days of old, did the darkness of the forests hold a fear for Baree. This night his hunt-cry had risen to the stars and the moon, and in that cry he had for the first time sent forth his defiance of night and space, his warning to all the wild, and his acceptance of the Brotherhood. In that cry, and the answers that came back to him, he sensed new power—the final triumph of nature in impinging on him the fact that the forests and the creatures they held were no longer to be feared, but that all things feared him. Off there, beyond the pale of the cabin and the influence of Nepeese, were all the things that the wolf-blood in him found now most desirable: companionship of his kind, the lure of adventure, the red, sweet blood of the chase—and matehood. This last, after all, was the dominant mystery that was urging him, and yet least of all did he understand it.

He ran straight into the darkness to the north and west, slinking low under the bushes, his tail drooping, his ears aslant—the wolf as the wolf runs on the night trail. The pack had swung due north, and was traveling faster than he, so that at the end of half an hour he could no longer hear it. But the lone wolf-howl to the west was nearer, and three times Baree gave answer to it.

At the end of an hour he heard the pack again, swinging southward. Pierrot would easily have understood. Their quarry had found safety beyond water, or in a lake, and the muhekuns were on a fresh trail. By this time not more than a quarter of a mile of the forest separated Baree from the lone wolf, but the lone wolf was also an old wolf, and with the directness and precision of long experience, he swerved in the direction of the hunters, compassing his trail so that he was leading for a point half or three-quarters of a mile in advance of the pack.

This was a trick of the brotherhood which Baree had yet to learn; and the result of his ignorance, and lack of skill, was that twice within the next half-hour he found himself near the pack without being able to join it. Then came a long and final silence. The pack had pulled down its kill, and in their feasting they made no sound.

The rest of the night Baree wandered alone, or at least until the moon was well on the wane. He was a long way from the cabin, and his trail had been an uncertain and twisting one, but he was no longer possessed with the discomforting sensation of being lost. The last two or three months had been developing strongly in him the sense of orientation, that "sixth sense" which guides the pigeon unerringly on its way and takes a bear straight as a bird might fly to its last year's denning place.

Marriage Wrecked on Rock of Discourtesy

There is nothing on earth that so grinds one as to be met with discourtesy and rudeness in daily life. I have watched for fifty years and I have found that the nasty little cancer that eats the deepest, and hurts the worst in married life is lack of courtesy, just common, everyday politeness in the way you address each other and in the attention you pay each other, in the way you eat your food, in the way you conduct yourself in the privacy of your bedchamber.

Be gracious! More men and women have lost themselves to each other by being rough and careless and sickening each other concerning the little niceties of life, when merely to keep up things in the way they began would have saved the whole situation.

At this minute if I should be asked to name the biggest rock on which matrimony stands, I would put my fingers on the thing that starts discontent and unhappiness, as lack of courtesy between men and wives, which very shortly culminates in disgust and disrespect.—Gene Stratton-Porter in a posthumous article in McCall's Magazine.

We Have Solved the Servant Problem

A few years ago a large percentage of our homes listed in their budget at least one servant and sometimes more. These were essential to perform the chores of housekeeping. The task was too great for one woman, especially if there were children to care for.

Today homes with servants are the exception, rather than the rule. However, today the housewife of every modest circumstances enjoys greater comforts than the wealthiest of twenty years ago.

The Smithsonian Institute tells us that every man, woman, and child now enjoys the equivalent of thirty slaves through the use of Electricity. That is, it would take thirty slaves per person to replace that which is being done by electric energy.

Electricity has solved the servant problem. The myriad of irksome household duties are disposed of in a twinkling by electrical servants. In the factories, production has leaped to undreamed of heights because of the availability of Electric power.

If you are not availing yourself of these servants, we would like the opportunity to show you how burdens can be lightened and efficiency increased.

TRIPLE-HEADED CELEBRATION WAS SUCCESS

Warren Was Scene of Beef Special Train, County Play Day, and Graduation Tues.

Tuesday was Beef Cattle Special Train day, County Play day, and eight grade graduation day at Warren, the county seat.

A. D. Collette, county club leader and secretary of the Warren Commercial club, was in charge of local arrangements for the beef cattle meeting and demonstration given by specialists of the university, club boys, and livestock producers.

Between 600 and 700 persons, mostly farmers, gave attentive hearing to the exercises which were staged on the platform and grounds of the Soo Company. Farmers came from all over the county, and points in Kittson county.

A. A. Dowell, livestock specialist of the university, presided. The northwestern part of the state, he said, has almost unexampled resources for the develepement of profitable beef production. It has rich soil which can grow great quantities of alfalfa, sweet clover and other forages, and oats barley which will put as good finish on beef stock as corn.

ANNOUNCEMEMT

Ira H. Burhans
Of Stephen, Minnesota.
CANDIDATE FOR County Attorney
Marshall County, Minn.
Your vote and support will be highly appreciated.

Atty. Ira H. Burhans, candidate for county attorney, came to Stephen in January, 1918, to take over P. A. McClernan's law practice, and has actively engaged in the practice of law here since that time, except for 18 months service in the army, He is a republican by party affiliation. He is 35 years old, born at Superior, Wis., a son of Ira W. Burhans, a lawyer of Holland Dutch extraction, and Helen Louise Hatch, of NewHampshire Yankee blood. He comes of a family of lawyers, his maternal grandfather also being a lawyer. In 1917 he married Millie Christine Newhouse, of Norwegian extraction and four children bless his home. His early life was spent in Superior, where he graduated from high school and worked in a law office.

"Burhans is plain-spoken, and works for the man that hires him He has as good a legal training as the University of this state gives lawyers. He is a veteran of the World War, having served for twelve months overseas, is a Legionaire, and a trial lawyer of promise. He has had ten years experience in handling office problems and has made himself familiar with farming conditions through his management of farms."—Paid Advertisement.

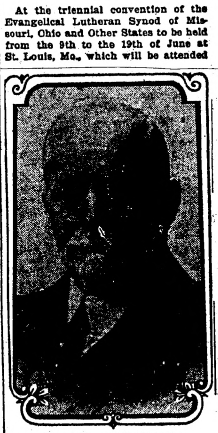
LAYMEN OF LUTHERAN SYNOD RAISE FUND

Finish Large Endowment Fund; Will Now Work for Church Extension Plans.

At the triennial convention of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio and Other States to be held from the 9th to the 19th of June at St. Louis, Mo., which will be attended by over 1,000 delegates, both lay and clerical, from all parts of the world, the Lutheran Laymen's League, an organization of laymen of that synod, will present to the convention the final one-half million dollars to complete the Three Million Dollar Endowment Fund for the pensioning of pastors of the synod.



THEO. h. LAMPRECHT
President Lutheran Laymen's League

The Lutheran Laymen's League was organized in 1917 to aid the synod in coping with its expanding financial needs, and shortly after its organization it presented the synod with $100,000 to wipe out all deficits in its treasuries. After achieving this the Lutheran Laymen's League set out to establish the Three Million Dollar Endowment Fund. At this convention they will present a memorial to raise another $3,500,000 for the Church Extension Fund of the synod to build chapels, schools and parsonages, and to help new missions all over the North American Continent to become self-supporting, helping them in the payment of rent for premises, since the high rentals are a great handicap to mission work.

Baree had not forgotten Nepeese. A dozen times he turned his head back and whined, and always he picked out accurately the direction in which the cabin lay. But he did not turn back. As the night lengthened, his search for that mysterious something which he had not found continued. His hunger, even with the fading-out of the moon and the coming of the gray dawn, was not sufficiently keen to make him hunt for food.

It was cold, and it seemed colder when the glow of the moon and stars died out. Under his padded feet, especially in the open spaces, was a thick white frost in which he left clearly at times the imprint of his toes and claws. He had traveled steadily for hours, a great many miles in all, and he was tired when the first light of the day came. And then there came the time when, with a sudden sharp click of his jaws, he stopped like a shot in his tracks.

At last it had come—the meeting with that for which he had been seeking. With her head toward him, and waiting for him as he came out of the shadows, his scent strong in her keen nose, stood Maheegun, the young wolf. Baree had not smelled her, but he saw her directly he came out of the rim of young balsams that fringed the open. It was then that he stopped, and for a full minute neither of them moved a muscle or seemed to breathe.

There was not a fortnight's difference in their age and yet Maheegun was much the smaller of the two; her body was as long, but she was slimmer; she stood on slender legs that were almost like the legs of a fox, and the curve of her back was that of a slightly bent bow, a sign of swiftness almost equal to the wind. She stood poised for flight even as Baree advanced his first step toward her, and then very slowly her body relaxed, and in a direct ratio as he drew nearer her ears lost their alertness and dropped aslant.

Baree whined. His ears were up, his head alert, his tail aloft and bushy. Cleverness, if not strategy, had already become a part of his masculine superiority, and he did not immediately press the affair. He was within five feet of Maheegun when he casually turned away from her and faced the east, where a faint penciling of red and gold was heralding the day. For a few moments he sniffed and looked around and pointed the wind with much seriousness, as though impressing on his fair acquaintance—as many a two-legged animal has done before him—his tremendous importance in the world at large.

And Maheegun was properly impressed. Baree's bluff worked as beautifully as the bluffs of the two-legged animals.

He sniffed the air with such thrilling and suspicious zeal that Maheegun's ears sprang alert, and she sniffed it with him; he turned his head from point to point so sharply and alertly that her feminine curiosity, if not anxiety, made her turn her own head in questioning conjunction.

And when Baree whined as though in the air he had caught a mystery which she could not possibly understand, a responsive note gathered in her throat, but smothered and low as a woman's exclamation when she is not quite sure whether she should interrupt her lord or not. At this sound, which Baree's sharp ears caught, he swung up to her with a light and mincing step, and in another moment they were smelling noses.

When the sun rose, half an hour later, it found them still in the small open on the side of the ridge, with a deep fringe of forest under them, and beyond that a wide, timbered plain which looked like a ghostly shroud in its mantle of frost. Up over this came the first red glow of the day, filling the open with a warmth that grew more and more comfortable as the sun crept higher.

Neither Baree nor Maheegun were inclined to move for a while, and for an hour or two they lay basking in a cup of the slope, looking down with questing and wideawake eyes upon the wooded plain that stretched away under them like a great sea.

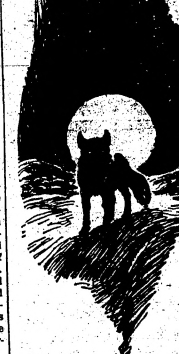
Maheegun, too, had sought the hunt-pack, and, like Baree had failed to catch it. They were tired, a little discouraged for the time, and hungry—but still alive with the fine thrill of anticipation, and restlessly sensitive to the new and mysterious consciousness of companionship. Half a dozen times Baree got up and nosed about Maheegun as she lay in the sun, whining to her softly and touching her soft coat with his muzzle, but for a long time she paid little attention to him. At last she followed him. All that day they wandered and rested together. Once more the night came.

It was without moon or stars. The snow began to fall at dusk, thickly, heavily, without a breath of sound. It was not cold, but it was still—so still that Baree and Maheegun traveled only a few yards at a time, and then stopped to listen. In this way all the night-prowlers of the forest were traveling, if they were moving at all. It was the first of the Big Snow.

To the flesh-eating wild things of the forests, clawed and winged, the Big Snow was the beginning of the winter carnival of slaughter and feasting, of wild adventure in the long nights, of merciless warfare on the frozen trails. The days of breeding, of motherhood—the peace of spring and summer—were over; out of the sky came the warning of the Northland, the call of all flesh-eating creatures to the long hunt, and in the first thrill of it living things were moving but little this night, and that watchfully and with suspicion.

Baree and Maheegun felt the exciting pulse of a new life. It lured them on. It invited them to adventure into the white mystery of the silent storm; and inspired by that restlessness of youth and its desires, they went on.

The snow grew deeper under their feet. In the open spaces they waded through it to their knees, and it continued to fall in a vast white cloud that descended steadily out of the sky. It was near midnight when it stopped.



With Her Head Toward Him Stood Maheegun, the Young Wolf.

The clouds drifted away from under the stars and the moon, and for a long time Baree and Maheegun stood without moving, looking down from the bald crest of a ridge upon a wonderful world.

Never had they seen so far, except in the light of day. Under them was a plain. They could see its forests, lone trees that stood up like shadows out of the snow, a stream—still unfrozen—shimmering like glass with the flicker of firelight on it. Toward this stream Baree led the way. He no longer thought of Nepeese, and he whined with pent-up happiness as he stopped halfway down and turned to muzzle Maheegun. He wanted to roll in the snow and frisk about with his companion; he wanted to bark, to put up his head and howl as he had howled at the Red Moon back at the cabin.

Something held him from doing these things. Perhaps it was Maheegun's demeanor. She accepted his attentions rigidly. Once or twice she had seemed almost frightened; twice Baree had heard the sharp clicking of her teeth. The previous night, and all through tonight's storm, their companionship had grown more intimate, but now there was taking its place a mysterious aloofness on the part of Maheegun. Pierrot could have explained. With the white snow under and about him, and the luminous moon and stars above him, Baree, like the night, had undergone a transformation which even the sunlight of day had not made in him before. His coat was like polished jet. Every hair in his body glistened black. Black! That was it. And Nature was trying to tell Maheegun that of all the creatures hated by her kind, the creature which they feared and hated most was black. With her it was not experience, but instinct—telling her of the age-old feud between the gray wolf and the black bear. Until they struck the broad openings of the plain, the young she-wolf had followed Baree without hesitation; now there was a gathering strangeness and indecision in her manner, and twice she stopped and would have let Baree go on without her.

An hour after they entered the plain there came suddenly out of the west the tonguing of the wolf-pack. It was not far distant, probably not more than a mile along the foot of the ridge, and the sharp, quick yapping that followed the first outburst was evidence that the long-fanged hunters had put up sudden game, a caribou or young moose, and were close at its heels. At the voice of her own people Maheegun laid her ears close to her head and was off like an arrow from a bow.

The unexpectedness of her movement and the swiftness of her flight put Baree well behind her in the race over the plain. She was running blindly, favored by luck. For an interval of perhaps five minutes the pack were so near to their game that they made no sound, and the chase swung full into the face of Maheegun and Baree. The latter was not half a dozen lengths behind the young wolf when a crashing in the brush directly ahead stopped them so sharply that they tore up the snow with their braced forefeet and squat haunches. Ten seconds later a caribou burst through and flashed across an open not more than twenty yards from where they stood. They could hear its swift panting as it disappeared. And then came the pack.

At sight of those swiftly moving gray bodies Baree's heart leaped for an instant into his throat. He forgot Maheegun, and that she had run away from him. The moon and the stars went out of existence for him. He no longer sensed the chill of the snow under his feet. He was wolf—all wolf. With the warm scent of the caribou in his nostrils, and the passion to kill sweeping through him like fire, he darted after the pack.

Very soon he found himself close to the flanks of one of the gray monsters of the pack; half a minute later a new hunter swept in from the bush behind him, and then a second, and after that a third. It was as if Baree had belonged to the pack always. He had joined it naturally, as other stray wolves had joined it from out of the bush; there had been no ostentation, no welcome such as Maheegun had given him in the open, no hostility. He belonged with these slim, swift-footed outlaws of the old forests, and his own jaws snapped and his blood ran hot as the smell of the caribou grew heavier, and the sound of its crashing body nearer.

It seemed to him they were almost at its heel when they swept into an open plain, a stretch of barren without a tree or a shrub, brilliant in the light of the stars and moon. Across its unbroken carpet of snow sped the caribou a spare hundred yards ahead of the pack. Now the two leading hunters no longer followed directly in the trail, but shot out at an angle, one to the right and the other to the left of the pursued, and like well-trained soldiers the pack split in halves and spread out fan-shape in the final charge.

The two ends of the fan forged ahead and closed in, until the leaders were running almost abreast of the caribou, with fifty or sixty feet separating them from the pursued. Thus, adroitly and swiftly, with deadly precision, the pack had formed a horseshoe cordon of fangs from which there was but one course of flight—straight ahead. For the caribou to swerve half a degree to the right or left meant death.

It was the duty of the leaders to draw in the ends of the horseshoe now, until one or both of them could make the fatal lunge for the hamstrings. After that it would be a simple matter. The pack would close in over the caribou like an inundation.

Baree had found his place in the lower rim of the horseshoe, so that he was fairly well in the rear when the climax came. The plain made a sudden dip. Straight ahead was the gleam of water—water shimmering softly in the starglow, and the sight of it sent a final great spurt of blood through the caribou's bursting heart. Forty seconds would tell the story—forty seconds of a last spurt for life, of a final tremendous effort to escape death. Baree felt the sudden thrill of these moments, and he forged ahead with the others in that lower rim of the horseshoe as one of the leading wolves made a lunge for the young bull's ham-string. It was a clean miss. A second wolf darted in. And this one also missed.

There was no time for others to take their place. From the broken end of the horseshoe Baree heard the caribou's heavy plunge into water. When Baree joined the pack, a maddened, mouth-frothing, snarling horde, Napamoos, the young bull, was well out in the river and swimming steadily for the opposite shore.

Control of Bee Disease Is Seen

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Widespread interest has been aroused throughout the beekeeping industry by the apparent success of some recently discovered disinfectant methods in the treatment and control of American foul-brood. Disinfectants such as an alcohol-formalin solution are being used with fair success, and eliminate to a great extent the large losses previously caused by the necessary destruction of all combs infected with this disease of the brood of bees.

The use of the alcohol-formalin solution as a disinfectant is a step in advance in the control of the disease, says the United States Department of Agriculture, but apparently there is still room for improvement which will eliminate the danger of occasional cases of failure. For that reason, and because of the great interest in the subject, the bee culture laboratory started preliminary work early in 1924 for the purpose of making an exhaustive study of the efficiency of various disinfectants, including the commercial alcohol-formalin solution as well as water-formalin solutions.

Results of Tests.

A discussion of the results of the tests completed to date has been published in Department Circular 284, which is now ready for distribution. It was hoped that the results of the investigation by laboratory methods would form a basis for practical work in the apiary. As the work has developed, numerous difficulties have been encountered which indicate that the problem of the perfect sterilization of American foul-brood combs is neither simple nor yet fully solved.

The results obtained with various dilutions of alcohol and of a alcohol-formalin solution as the carrier for 20 per cent of their volume of formalin are not sufficiently complete to warrant conclusions as to their relative efficiency. All of these solutions are unsatisfactory, in that they do not completely sterilize all sealed cells in 48 hours. A 20 per cent solution of formalin in water, without alcohol, is slightly less efficient than the alcoholic solutions in sterilizing in 48 hours the contents of sealed cells, because of its failure to penetrate many of the cappings; but it sterilizes all open cells in that period.

Satisfactory Results.

In view of the cultural results obtained, however, a 20 per cent solution of formalin in water was found the most satisfactory disinfectant for sterilizing infected combs, with regard both to germicidal action and low cost, provided the proper precautions are taken. All honey should be extracted, all brood cappings should be completely removed, and the combs should be treated at least twenty-four hours, or forty-eight hours if it is found desirable to wash them in water after treatment.

Care must be taken not only with the process of disinfecting combs infected with American foul-brood, no matter what solution or method is used, but equal or greater care must be exercised in the treatment of the diseased colonies themselves to eliminate the danger of recurrence of disease from that source. The successful sterilization of the combs will otherwise be of little avail.

A copy of the circular may be secured, as long as the supply lasts, by writing to the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Poison Bait Effective in Control of Cutworm

An inexpensive poison bait is usually very effective in controlling the cutworms in a newly planted strawberry plantation. The following formula is enough for about five acres and you can make up smaller quantities according to the same proportion:

Bran, 20 pounds.
Paris green, 1 pound.
Cheap sirup, 2 quarts.
Three lemons.
Three and one-half gallons water.

The bran and paris green are mixed dry. The juice of the lemons is squeezed into the water, and the peel and pulp is chopped to fine bits and added to the water, then dissolve the sirup in the water and fruit mixture and stir the liquid into the bran thoroughly in order to dampen it evenly.

It is suggested that the poison bait be applied in the evening, since cutworms are night feeders, and the bait will thus be fresher than if it is applied earlier in the day.

Raising Orphan Lamb

If the orphan lamb cannot be given to another ewe, it can generally be raised satisfactorily on a bottle. Of course it is better to get another ewe to adopt the lamb if possible. When necessary to raise a lamb on a bottle, it will need to be fed several times a day at first. The number of feedings can be reduced until, by the time the lamb is six weeks old, three or four times a day will be sufficient. A lamb creep should be provided where some ground grain can be kept for the lambs. They will soon learn to eat grain and this will help a great deal in getting faster growth

Alfalfa Weevil in a New Picture Film

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

"Alfalfa Weevil Control," a new motion picture of the United States Department of Agriculture, gives a general idea of how to combat the insect and is of particular interest in the western states. Alfalfa is described as the foundation of agriculture in the West—"a hog's dream of heaven"—and as one of the world's most valuable forages. About 1904 or 1905 the alfalfa weevil, which belongs to the same family as the cotton boll weevil, was discovered in Utah. Since that time it has spread slowly but steadily until now it is found in seven states. Because of the importance of the alfalfa crop the alfalfa weevil constitutes a serious menace. Several states enforce quarantine restrictions to prevent further spread of the insect, and the luggage of automobile travelers is often examined.

Two measures of control are shown in the picture. Dusting with powdered arsenates is still in an experimental stage, but appears to have promise of proving effective. The use of poisonous sprays has proved its worth and is particularly recommended. Several types of sprayers are shown, including one with a very wide boom. Several scenes showing sprayed and unsprayed fields, side by side, are particularly interesting in depicting the benefits of this method of control. One spraying is usually considered sufficient to permit plants to make new growth, and protects the second crop as well as the first.

The film is one reel long and is a contribution from the bureau of entomology. It will be circulated through the film distribution system of the Department of Agriculture and the co-operating state institutions. Copies may be borrowed for short periods, or may be bought by authorized purchasers, at the laboratory charge.

Free Scouring Tests of Wool Samples Are Made

Wool growers may have samples of their wools graded and scoured, free of charge, by filing an application with the bureau of agricultural economics, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., where a wool-scouring laboratory is now available for conducting such tests as facilities will permit. Applications should be mailed to G. T. Willingmyre, in charge of wool standardization. The applicant will be sent a parcel post mailing sack and instructions as to the proper method of drawing a sample so that it will be representative of any large lot of raw wool in the grease.

Experiments conducted in the laboratory during the past year have yielded valuable information on scour-loss or "shrinkage" of a large variety of domestic raw wools. The results have proved of great interest to many wool growers and their practical application will enable any producer to obtain a reasonably accurate estimate of shrinkage of his wool.

Wool samples submitted to the department will be returned scoured, together with a report of the shrinkage and the grade in which the wool has been classified according to the official wool grades of the United States.

Grass and Grasshoppers Good for Young Poults

The Rhode Island experiment station demonstrated pretty completely that turkeys could stand all the green food and milk they would eat, but should be fed pretty sparingly on grain, given perhaps half or so of what one would naturally think they needed.

Turkeys should be kept in in wet weather, at least should not be allowed to get wet, but allowed as great range as possible as soon as they are old enough to take it safely. It is best to feed them around home so as to have them back every night, but the greater range they can have the more natural the food becomes, as in that case they eat greens and insects. Where grasshoppers abound, turkeys usually do well.

It is important to select healthy stock.

Farm Hints

The best grapes grow from pruned vines.

• • •

Lubricating oil is cheaper than machinery. Drain the crank case of your tractor often.

• • •

Potatoes may be kept in good condition for late planting by greening or sun-sprouting.

• • •

Sweet clover that was seeded this spring should not be pastured until the plants have made a growth of at least a foot.

• • •

Sweet clover requires as much lime as alfalfa on soils tested and found sour. It may be seeded in wheat like common clover or with oats in the spring.

• • •

The care of trees is quite similar to the care of domestic animals. As a cow must be fed, housed, and doctored, a tree must be planted in a well managed soil, pruned and sprayed.

SHOULD HUSBANDS DO HOUSE WORK?

How Mrs. Dyer Solved the Problem.

Mrs. Mildred Dyer was lucky. She had a good-natured husband who helped her with much of her housework. Because she was in ill health for five years, it was often necessary for him to do this. But it bothered Mrs. Dyer. She felt that he had to work hard enough anyway. The time he spent in doing her work was needed for his own. She determined to find the road to better health.

She writes: "I think Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is simply wonderful. My health is better than it has ever been. I am getting stronger and gaining in weight."

She has solved her problem and her household is happier. The Dyers live at Redlands, Calif., Route A, Box 138.

How often does your husband have to do your housework? No matter how willing he is, no woman feels comfortable about it. Perhaps you, too, will find better health through the faithful use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Letter Long in Mail

The A. E. F. are not the only American soldiers who had trouble with their mail, remarks Capper's Weekly. An undelivered letter written 63 years ago by a Civil war veteran to his father has just been found in the files of the War department. Recently N. B. Jordan, writer of the letter, died at Beloit, Kans. His widow asked to be put on the pension roll and this led to the discovery of the letter. Jordan's father, to whom it was written, died in 1890 at the age of eighty-eight. The writer of the letter, his son, died in the same room last January also at the age of eighty-eight.

INCREASE RESERVE OFFICERS' INTEREST

General Staff Plans Series of Radio Talks.

Washington.—In an effort to increase the interest of reserve officers of the army and give them some military instruction at home, Lieut.-Col. H. Edmund Bullis, general staff, is seeking the co-operation of several radio broadcasting stations. He believes that he can reach 40,000 reservists, who live in rural communities or at least are out of contact with the regular army, by a series of radio broadcast talks on military subjects, and proposes to establish a small broadcast school next fall.

To start next fall's instruction he is preparing eight ten-minute radio talks to be given by army officers from the stations willing to co-operate. It is desired to give these talks at the same time on the same week day for eight consecutive weeks. The eighth lesson would be in the form of an examination. All reserve officers who send their solutions to the problems to the radio stations will have their papers graded and returned by an army officer designated for this purpose.

The stations and dates of talks will be announced at this summer's training camps by means of official war department bulletins and through the various military publications. Suggestions and offers of co-operation from any radio stations will be gladly received by Lieut.-Col. H. Edmund Bullis, war department, Washington.

Through the courtesy of the program director of WOAP arrangements were made for Colonel Bullis while on an inspection trip to deliver his talk, "What Our Army Does Besides Fight," from fourteen different radio stations.

Ancient Chinese Drug Better Than Adrenalin

Madison, Wis.—New uses have been found for an ancient Chinese drug, ephedrine, which indicate it will be a "powerful aid in the hands of modern physicians" in raising the blood pressure, treatment of asthma and colds, and as an anesthetic, the University of Wisconsin announced.

Research conducted by Dr. Ko-Kuei Chen, pharmacologist at the university, with the drug indicates, he said, that it is superior to adrenalin in the ability to raise the blood pressure over long periods. Experiments are being conducted to determine whether it also is useful in the treatment of hay fever.

Doctor Chen has found a new method for isolating ephedrine, which has been used for medical purposes in China for more than 5,000 years. The drug, which has been submitted to tests here and at the Mayo clinic and the University of Pennsylvania, he said, has been declared an "excellent" treatment for asthma and colds in the head, and a valuable anesthetic.

Sue to Keep Brother From Erecting Tombstone

Cleveland, Ohio.—Four brothers and sisters have brought suit here to restrain another brother from having a tombstone erected on the grave of their parents. They charged he had his name, Ferdinand Brettschneider, carved on the stone and that he declared it would be erected thus when the other heirs objected because specifications of the family were disregarded.

Mill That Cast 1812 Cannon Is Abandoned

Bridgewater, Mass.—The rolling mill of the Stanley Iron works of this town, said to be the only one of its kind in the world, will be abandoned and that section of the plant will be moved to New Britain, Conn.

The mill was founded in 1784. Cannon for the War of 1812 and other wars were cast at this historic plant, and years ago one of its chief sources of revenues was from casting blubber pots for whaling vessels.

The machine shop and foundry here will be retained.

SOME HINTS FOR THE CCEAN "TENDERFOOT"

First Passage Is Full of New Adventures.

Washington.—Increased facilities for crossing the Atlantic at reasonable cost, prosperity at home, and cheap money abroad are combining to send a larger army of American tourists to Europe this summer than any, probably, that has ever invaded the Old World in a like period. Many of these travelers, familiar enough with their pullmans and river steamers, will find conditions on an ocean liner disconcertingly strange. A bulletin from the Washington headquarters of the National Geographic society introduces the "ocean tenderfoot" to this new environment in which he will be confined from five to ten days.

"Getting off is an exciting matter," says the bulletin, "and the temptation is to spend the last hour or so near the gangplanks, chatting with your own friends and watching the milling throng of travelers and well-wishers in holiday spirit. If you are wise, however, you will invest say 20 minutes of this time for your own future comfort. Take a turn around the promenade deck and select the neighborhood in which you would like to have your deck chair. You will not find distinguishing numbers on the chairs, but where you would least expect them—on the ceiling above.

Selecting a Steamer Chair.

"You probably will want your chair on the starboard (or right) side going to Europe and on the port (or left) side returning, for those are the sunny sides. Having decided on the location you desire and noticed the neighboring numbers, look up the deck steward and try to persuade him to allot you a chair somewhere in the neighborhood. There will be a fee, of course, for the chair and a steamer rug. If you are traveling with friends you will wish to make this a joint arrangement so as not to be separated.

"Watch the bulletin boards. These are the town criers and newspapers on shipboard. There are little daily papers, too, on the larger liners. Usually there will be a bulletin board in the main companionway at the promenade deck level, another outside the dining saloon and a third, perhaps, in the smoking room.

"Your seat in the dining saloon is usually arranged for, unless otherwise announced, at the first meal after sailing.

"Cheerful bugle blasts order your life on many of the big liners, but you must learn what they mean or they will lead you hopelessly astray. The blast in the reasonably early morning, say at eight o'clock, ship's time, means either of two things: If you are an early riser and are taking a pre-breakfast walk on deck, it is a signal that your food is ready. If you are a late sleeper (and an ocean voyage is the chance of a lifetime for laziness) it means that you can take forty winks and still be in time for a late breakfast.

"If you hear a bugle blast at about 10:30 pay no attention to it. It is not for you and your fellow passengers, but for the ship's crew. It signifies that the captain is making an unexpected inspection of some part of his domain.

Hot Broth Unheralded.

"Having made the acquaintance of the breakfast bugle, the 'ocean tenderfoot' might well think the 10:30 bugle call connected in some way with the hot broth that appears about this time for those in deck chairs. But this comes quite unheralded—a mere detail in carrying out the ship management's evident intention to keep the passengers continually busy with food. The food schedule on a big liner runs something like this: Breakfast, 8 to 10; hot broth, 10:30 or 11; luncheon, 1 to 2:30; after-luncheon coffee, 2 to 3; afternoon tea and cakes, 4 to 5; dinner, 7:30 to 9; after-dinner coffee, 8:30 to 9:30; sandwiches in the smoking room, 10 to 11.

"The second bugle for passengers blows at one o'clock and means that luncheon is then ready. At 7 p. m. the bugle sounds again. But do not rush to the dining saloon. It is simply a signal that it is time to dress for dinner! At 7:30 the bugler quite outdoes himself in the cheeriness of his call to the chief prandial occasion of the day.

"The only other major signal of the day on shipboard is the blowing of the whistle exactly at noon, ship's time. On the larger liners, at least, the whistle is heard at no other time unless there is a dense fog. The whistle is blown for a double purpose at noon: to signal the time and to test the whistle itself.

"You must watch your time carefully on shipboard. On the trip to Europe you will lose five hours. What the loss is each twenty-four hours depends on the speed. On the fastest liners it amounts to an hour a day.

"Don't fancy you can stand at the rail and see the traffic of the Seven Seas go by on your way to Europe. The day of crowded steamer lanes is no more. Now two tracks are 'staked out' in the ocean for ships: one eastbound and one westbound. On one of its most recent voyages to Europe the huge Majestic was seemingly almost as isolated as Columbus' little fleet. It sighted a tramp steamer the second day out from New York. There was no additional visual evidence that other ships sail the Atlantic until the big vessel approached the English channel only a few miles from her destination."

ONLY WOMAN RULER IN INDIA RESIGNS

Begum of Bhopal Turns Job Over to Son.

London.—India's only woman ruler, her highness the begum of Bhopal, has abdicated her throne in favor of her son, Nawab Zada Hamidulla. For a long time she had contended for the Islamic right to name her successor, who under ordinary procedure should have been the son of her deceased eldest son, Nawab Nasrulla Khan. The British government finally acceded to her desires.

The abdication of the begum brings to an end 25 years of female rule in the little state of central India of 6,902 square miles with a population of about 700,000. She had ruled Bhopal with vigor and statesmanship.

Although now sixty-eight years old, she still is mentally and physically vigorous. Nevertheless she had long wished to see her only son established as her successor before her powers failed her.

Accordingly, she came to London last September with her son and his three young daughters to arrange matters with the British government. The necessity for the special arrangement lay in the fact that two elder sons, both of whom died in 1924, left sons, and the eldest son of her eldest son stood next in line of succession, according to the laws of primogeniture.

Nawab Zada Hamidulla is now thirty-one years old. He has been trained in statesmanship under his mother's direction. He was on the staff of the prince of Wales during the prince's recent visit to India and also served in the World war. He has a splendid reputation.

It is understood that if the government had not granted the begum's request to name her successor she would have remained on the throne rather than turn over the rule of Bhopal to a minor. Having succeeded in her efforts, she retires happily from the cares of government. She is still in England with her family, but will return to India.

The begum always has had the happiness of her people at heart, and is beloved by them. She adheres strictly to the rule of Islam, calling for women to conceal their faces.

War Game to Test Air Defense of East

Washington.—Practical test of the coast defense value of aircraft against a modern fleet may form a part of the joint army-navy maneuvers to be held in August next year at Narragansett Bay.

Preliminary plans for the games have been made possible by an agreement in congress on the fuel item of the navy appropriation bill, which will permit the battle fleet to come into the Atlantic next spring.

Selection of the Narragansett bay area means that defenses of the northeastern frontier section are to be tested, with the major portion of the fleet on the attack. With the date set more than a year from now, both of the giant airplane carriers, Lexington and Saratoga, should be with the fleet, carrying a striking force of 231 fighting, bombing, torpedo and scouting planes with which the defenders will have to deal.

The east-coast games will afford the first opportunity for mobilization of the army air fleets to repel an attack by sea and air. Col. William Mitchell, former assistant army air chief, contended during the recent aviation controversy that an adequate air force could safeguard the coast line and dominate a 200-mile area off shore, preventing any hostile fleet commander from risking destruction within that distance.

"Lady Luck" Failed the Former German Kaiser

Berlin.—"Lady Luck," in addition to a large army, was regarded by the former kaiser as an important factor in the success or failure of his dreams of Germany as a world empire, judging from "good luck" emblems in the former imperial palace.

Above a gilded and intricately carved door leading from the sumptuously furnished anteroom connecting with the former kaiser's study, there hangs a rusty old horseshoe. It dangles on a rusty nail driven into the gilded portal under which the kaiser passed many times a day. The horseshoe was picked up by him more than twenty-five years ago while he was riding horseback in the Tiergarten.

The superstitious among his former subjects incline to the belief that the kaiser's dreams failed because the horseshoe was hung with the points down, instead of up.

Cost of Child First 18 Years Now $7,202

New York.—It costs $7,202 to rear a child during the first 18 years of its life, according to an estimate by an insurance company.

The total is divided as follows: Birth, $250; food, $2,500; clothing and shelter, $3,400; education, $1,150; health, $248; recreation, $130; insurance, $54; sundries, $570. These items, exclusive of $1,100 of the education bill, which the survey says the child may pay for itself, total $7,202.

Daily Dose of Iodine as Goiter Preventive

Iodine as a preventive of goiter is no new thing under the sun, according to Dr. Gilbert D. Harris of Cornell university. In Science, he quotes from an old Spanish medical work by an early French scientist, Boussingault, who wrote in 1825. In one place the author states that "till now, iodine is the only specific known for goiter." Elsewhere he continues, regarding certain mineral springs in Colombia. "In the province of Antioquia no other salt is used, save that from these peculiar springs, whose waters I have analyzed and convinced myself that, though the composition of their salts is variable, there is in all an appreciable amount of iodine. Hence the reason that there is no goiter in Antioquia. Each inhabitant takes every day a dose of iodine with the salt he consumes." Again: "It is a singular fact that for more than a century these waters have been recognized as a sure specific for goiter."

New Cancer Theory

T. P. Van Calcar, professor of bacteriology, hygiene and public health at the Leyden university, has just made an announcement of the results of his researches concerning the origin of cancer. He claims that he has discovered the cancer parasite, or the causative organism of cancer. A protozoan of a type discovered in cancer cells has been isolated and from a culture subsequently prepared the disease has been produced in dogs. His theory is that cancer cells send out offshoots and thus devour other cells. Professor Van Calcar has succeeded in cultivating the so-called protozoa and then making decisive experiments on dogs fed with the protozoa, the result being the appearance of cancer in the dogs' stomachs.

Matter of Dress

In a certain grade school in the city, the teachers began wearing smocks. The first day little Willie's teacher observed from time to time that he was gazing at her out of very quizzical looking eyes. At recess she noticed that he seemed equally fascinated with the other teachers' smocks. She decided that he was attracted by the bright colors. At the close of school that evening, he rather shyly paused at her desk a moment.

"Did you want something, Willie?" she asked kindly.

He lifted his round, innocent eyes to her face and said: "Yes'm, Miss Smith. Why are all the teachers wearing their kimonos to school?"—Indianapolis News.

Man's Rubber Qualities

Dr. William Seifriz, professor of botany at the University of Pennsylvania, is appraising how much "rubber" there is in man's make-up, just as the engineers have tested the coefficient of the elasticity of steel and other elasticity structural materials. So far he has discovered that the blood cell, or corpuscle, stretches to only three times its original sizes before it breaks.

Big Entertainment Offered At Marshall County Fair

Advance Inquiries Indicate Biggest Showing of Agricultural Products at 1926 Fair.

Four big auto races, with purses of $150 each, together with fast pony races and Ford novelty races, will provide thrills galore to the thousands of visitors from all parts of the northwest who plan to attend the Marshall County Fair and Fourth of July celebration in Warren July 5, 6, 7.

The races make up only a small part of the gigantic program arranged for the 1926 fair, said John A. Grindeland, secretary of the fair association, as there will be talented free attractions before the grand stand, band concerts, baseball games, fireworks, bowery dances, midway shows, and livestock shows for the entertainment of the visitors.

Inquiries are already pouring into the office of the secretary requesting reservations for space for the exhibition of livestock and other agricultural products, all indicating that the people of Marshall and adjoining counties are taking an active interest in the fair this year.

On Monday July 5, a regular old-fashioned Fourth of July celebration, with modern improvements and ideas will be staged, the Warren Post No. 27 of the American Legion cooperating with the fair association in arranging the program. Assurances have been made for a big parade in the morning commencing at 9.30 o'clock. This parade will be more than a mile long, will have many features such as attractive floats, decorated automobiles, Little German Band, Warren City Band, and Legionaires of Northwestern Minnesota. A patriotic program will be given at the City Park in Warren, featured by an address by Ludwig I. Roe, past commander of of the Minnesota department of the American Legion.

The Thearle-Duffield Co. of Chicago, the same company that displays fireworks at the Minnesota State Fair, will make a big display at the fair in Warren. The have arranged an unusual and novel display, featured mostly with historical events commemorating the 150th anniversary of the signing of Declaration of Independence. The fireworks display will be on July 5 and 6, combining a three days program in two days.

"We have held big celebrations in Warren in former years," said C. A. Nelson, President of the fair association, "but the twentieth anniversary will surpass the all in entertainment and education. Make your plans now to attend."

Beef Raising Pays

That beef-raising pays as well as dairying in this community was demonstrated last week when J. P. Benitt, who is engaged in the raising of Aberdeen Angus beef cattle, sold three steers to J. M. Swan, local cattle buyer, which netted Mr. Benitt $248.20. One steer was sixteen months old and brot $91.80. The other two were yearlings and brot $78.20 each.

Mr. Benitt was very much pleased with the returns on the three head of young stock.

MONDAY LONGEST DAY OF THE YEAR

Monday was the longest day of the year. The sun rose at 4:31 a. m. and set at 8;26 making 15 hours and 55 minutes of sunshine. The sun was obscured for a few minutes in the afternoon during a light drizzle.

There will be only a slight variance in the number of hours of daylight during the rest of June.

NOTICE!

The Holt Boys and Girls Club will meet in the Holt School house Saturday evening, June 26 to arrange a program to be given at a later date.

TRIPPED BY VANITY, MOAN OF SWINDLER

Fondness for Fancy Barbering Leads to Arrest.

Philadelphia. — Robert Whitman, alias "Lord Beaverbrook," and John H. Wiedemier, who has traveled under so many different names that the list looks like a telephone directory, sat in his cell in Moyamensing prison and told of some of his exploits in swindling wealthy women, while additional charges poured in from various parts of the country.

As he dallied over a specially ordered meal, the alleged sheik of swindlers talked with detectives who arrested him.

"My vanity caused my downfall," he said. "The gumshoes knew I always made for a fancy barber shop to get a manicure and a massage as soon as I hit a town, so they just sat behind their papers in the hotel until I walked in. When the barber had finished the job, they pulled me. I knew it was all up."

There are many charges against "Lord Beaverbrook." The only one by a Philadelphia woman, so far, is made by Mrs. Frances Kemp, who charges the dapper prisoner swindled her out of $18,000. Police say there are at least fifty victims. Some of these women he married, some he swindled and some he both married and swindled.

A million dollars is the amount he is said to have taken from his victims. At present, however, Whitman claims to be "broke," despite the fact the detectives who arrested him say he offered to split $50,000 between them for his freedom. He later stated he lost $100,000 to gamblers in Atlantic City before coming here.

Police say "his lordship" has a long police record over the country, having served several years in prison. He is alleged to have jumped parole on his last sentence.

Relics From Ur Find Way to United States

Philadelphia.—A fine collection of statues, household belongings and other relics from that ancient capital, Ur of the Chaldees, have found a resting place in America.

These exhibits, which show how the arts were practiced over 4,000 years ago under the protection of the Moon goddess, are a prominent feature of the new wing in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania. The wing, which recently was opened, is dedicated to Eckley Brinton Coxe, Jr., in recognition of his services in aiding the museum to conduct researches and excavations, and especially for his great interest in Egyptology.

The collection from Ur is a result of the joint expedition sent out by the museum of the University of Pennsylvania and the British museum to excavate the famous old metropolis.

140 People Crowd on Loneliest British Isle

There are 140 persons on the island, which is nearly double the population of 20 years ago, and the food supply has run short. The island is located in the middle of the Atlantic on a line between the Cape of Good Hope and Buenos Aires. It is only two miles long and adjoins two or three other smaller volcanic islands.

Most of the population consists of shipwrecked sailors and wives they have brought from St. Helena. Potatoes are the chief crop, but they were a failure this year.

MISNAMING NATIONS ESTABLISHED HABIT

Titles Usually Oldest Relics of Humanity.

Washington. — The United States does not recognize Russia. Neither does Russia recognize "Russia," according to the United States Post Office department.

If an American wishes to order caviar through a Moscow concern, the best advice is that he address the letter to the Union of Socialistic Soviet Republics. In order to educate the world to the new name, the Soviet government frequently carries out its threat to return all mail addressed to "Russia."

"Misnaming nations is one of our established habits," says a bulletin of the National Geographic society from its headquarters in Washington. "The following are the real names which well-known nations call themselves. How many can you identify? Misr, Eesti Wabariik, Suomen Tasavalta, Afrikiya, Iran, Die Republik Osterreich, El Maghreb, Lietuva, Fistin.

"Since United States citizens do not call foreign nations by their native names, they take liberties with ours. When a representative of the National Geographic society left for the Trentino district, Italy, recently, he carried business cards which gave the society's name in Italian and the address as 'America.' Neither 'United States' nor 'U. S. A.' appeared on the card. In rural districts the peasants know of 'America,' but many of them have never heard of the 'United States.'

"The world habit of misnaming nations can be excused. Some nations cannot agree on their own names so the world must fix on some form. One of the discoveries of Americans touring Europe is that Switzerland is not Switzerland. If you are in north or German Switzerland it is Schweiz, south or Italian Switzerland it is Svizzera, west or French Switzerland, Suisse. The map shows Luxemburg on the international fence between Germany and France. It is also on the lingual fence, possessing two names, Grand-Duche de Luxembourg and Grosherzogtum Luxemburg. The Irish Free State also is known by the Gaelic, Saorstat Eireann.

Perpetuate Ancient Ideas.

"Excepting New world titles, names of nations are usually the oldest relics of humanity. Like all antiques, their origins are often shrouded in mystery. Frequently names perpetuate the opinion one tribe had of another in the days of barbarism. The official name of Germany today is Deutsches Reich. They call themselves Deutsch, which is the name English-speaking people have allotted to the natives of Netherlands. The French call them Allemandes, literally, foreigners. Slavs call the Germans 'Niemiec,' which means 'dumb men.' They were 'dumb men' to the Slavs since they could not speak the Slav language. Slavs call themselves Slowjane, 'the intelligent people,' but all Germans call them the Wends, that is, 'the strangers.'

"England reveals name dissension nearer home. The Welsh call the English the Saeson; the Gaels of Scotland call the English Saoz; the Irish, Sasunaich, and the Manxmen, Sagsopach. A Welshman is not a Welsh to a Welshman, but a Cymry.

"In the Japanese name for their island kingdom, Nippon, a geographic absurdity has been corrected by a modern geographic decision. 'Ni' means sun and 'pon,' rising. Japan is the country of the rising sun. To whom could it be the country over which the sun rose? Not to Japanese certainly! Obviously it is a Chinese name because the island lay where the Chinese saw the sun rise. But within the last century the international date line was marked down the center of the Pacific ocean. It establishes where day begins, according to earthly agreement. Therefore, Japan is the first major territory touched by the rising sun of a new day.

"Americans" Appropriate "America."

"Consider our nation's name 'the United States of America.' Americans proudly proclaim that that title does not stand for a nation which is an empire gathering vast territories to itself by conquest. Yet the present use of 'the United States of America' is one of the most remarkable and bare-faced conquests on record in the world of nomenclature. An American is recognized everywhere now as a native of the United States, but there are 75,000,000 people in Canada, Central America, Mexico and South America, who have just as much right to the name as the 125,000,000 citizens of the United States. We speak of 'the United States' as if there could be only one federation by that title. There are two other 'the United States'—Venezuela and Brazil.

"The United States has been empirical even in the pronunciation of the name America. The French call us 'Amerique' and the Italians 'America,' with the 'am' one syllable as in 'ambulance.' This is probably the style of the Florentine accountant, Amerigo Vespucci, who donated his Christian name to label two continents. But English-speaking Americans have changed all that. We use the 'A' as a springboard and take a running dive into 'merica.'

"The American versions of the nations enumerated earlier in this bulletin are: Egypt, Esthonia, Finland, Tunisia, Persia, Austria, Morocco, Lithuania, Palestine."

CALLIOPES HERALD RIVER SHOWBOATS

Floating Theaters Begin Their Summer Season.

Cincinnati.—Calliopes' shrill musical blasts reverberate in the small river towns these warm days as the showboats, embarked on a promising summer season, pull along shore and cast anchor.

In the fleet of floating theaters from the biggest and oldest to the smallest, there are nine of the flat-bottomed vessels in operation this year. They will cruise the rivers from the extreme points on the Ohio, the Allegheny and the Illinois to the lowest points on the South on the Mississippi.

Showboats have played the river settlements for nearly half a century. Some showmen virtually have made homes of them and grown old with them. Their business, many of the owners say, is as flourishing now as ever.

The largest afloat this year is the Cotton Blossom, with a seating capacity of 2,000. The Cotton Blossom has replaced the Golden Rod, which formerly was the largest.

Then comes French's New Sensation. On its up-river cruise it anchored here for a brief lay-over, took on a number of new people engaged for the summer and went on its way.

The showboats usually pass by Cincinnati unnoticed. When occasionally they stop the calliope is silent and there are no crowds to greet them. Their repertory never finds an audience in Cincinnati, although they do have patronage in some of the larger cities along the course.

It is mostly in the small river town, where theaters are few or not at all, that the calliope awakens the countryside and draws the population for miles around to the river bank.

The larger boats that have bands unload the show and invoke a holiday. The stars come ashore and meet the crowd, and the band spends the afternoon parading about town, collecting an audience for the evening performance.

There is nothing heavy about the drama in the river theaters, but they usually have fair musical accompaniment to comedies and the melodramatic plays that thrive on mystery and romance.

The bigger theaters, after spending the winter South, as is usually their custom, have headed North, and the fleet is augmented by smaller craft which operate only in the summer.

Spend Half Million to Get Better Products

Washington. — American industries are estimated by officials of the bureau of standards to be spending half a million dollars a year in co-operative researches with the bureau to promote higher standards of products.

Under the research associate plan, adopted shortly after the war when the increasing demand for highly trained technical men threatened depletion of the bureau staff, a manufacturer places a graduate physicist, chemist or engineer, at the bureau for one or more years to carry on, with government experts, an investigation of a particular industry.

"This plan," says Dr. George K. Burgess, bureau director, has proved valuable, both in the training of additional research specialists by association with the bureau staff and in maintaining the research output of the bureau in lines which are of special industrial importance."

The co-operative method, however, is looked upon as somewhat more certain of practical results since both the views of the government and private industrial experts are woven into the tests.

Leap Years of Moses Had Seven Extra Days

Geneva.—Moses made a Pentecostal eighth day in Pentecost week so as to find a place for the extra day left over from the 52-week year.

Charles F. Marvin, chief of the United States weather bureau, is given as authority for this statement in a communication received by the League of Nations from the International Fixed Calendar league.

The League of Nations, which is engaged in a study of calendar reform, was also informed that Moses, instead of using leap days, inserted a leap week into the midst of each 28-year period.

Brothers Reunited When Autos Collide

Washington. — Two brothers, lost from each other for thirty years, but who, through all that period lived but forty miles apart, were reunited when their automobiles scraped fenders here.

That was the story told by a traffic officer who happened by as the slight accident occurred. They are Clarence Williams of Washington and George Williams of Baltimore.

Obeying traffic rules, they stopped and gave each other their names. Puzzled for a second at the similarity of names and by memories of long ago, the brothers were convinced of their relationship after putting together, piece by piece, information of their earlier days.

IN THE FOUR-FLUSH ROW

By JACK WOODFORD

(©, 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)

IT WAS a beautiful building, set just far enough back from the street to allow for several artistic shade trees to grace a sleek lawn. It was three stories high, a sort of French chateau type of architecture, with large bay windows which featured leaded glass cut up into small panes. In the center of each window there was a small coat of arms worked in with bits of colored glass.

The entrance to the building was a symphony of soft green carpet, a little tinkling fountain, unique chairs —French renaissance; it was the sort of entrance hall in which one immediately lowers one's voice much in the mood that one lowers one's voice in the chancel of an old church.

Behind the pretentious building were little private garages, and in the garages were ornate, showy cars. "Four-flush row," the neighbors called the beautiful building which contained seventy-two large, modern apartments, for the building was a strange hybrid among buildings in spite of its undoubted symmetry and beauty, in that, it was way beyond the reach, as far as rental was concerned, of the average person; and, at the same time, not quite expensive enough to satisfy the fastidious tastes of the really wealthy; and so, "Four-flush row" had always housed a peculiar type of tenant. The type who are always just about to make a million dollars; the type who watch the used car sale advertisements for "tony" cars with aristocratic names; cars that can hardly be told from new; the kind who buy furs cleverly imitative of the real thing being worn by Mme. This, or Duchess That; the kind who use crested letter paper upon which to write with gold pens with long feathers on the end of them; the kind who talk of having once met Mr. Astor and Mr. Gould—the kind, in short, from whom it is excruciatingly hard to collect the too large rent which they have unwisely undertaken to pay.

"Really, you know, my dear, these apartments are so very small; you see in Ridgewood we grew accustomed to eighteen rooms, and it is so hard to get along with twelve," and so forth, and so on. They were forever trying to impress each other; always jealous of the number of sleek cars seen calling at each other's apartment, forever giving teas to which some celebrity had been bribed or threatened, or intrigued into coming; always striving to hurdle just a little further into the limelight of artistic deception; never quite succeeding in deceiving anyone but themselves. Four-flush row was the despair of the tradesmen in the neighborhood. Downtown department stores included in the curriculum of their training course for new drivers explicit instructions as to how to deport themselves at Four-flush row—packages must never, positively never, be left until the money in payment for same had crossed the palm of the deliveryman.

Into Four-flush row one day came the king of four-flushers, also the queen, and the prince and princess, in the persons of Mr. and Mrs. T. Van Trevvor Jones, and their son and daughter. The T. Van Trevvor Joneses did not move in all at once; they employed vans in relays. Two vans carrying their swagger possessions arrived during the daytime, and the other occupants of Four-flush row were treated to some dazzling sights in the way of dernier cri furniture during broad daylight; after dusk had fallen two more trucks drove up and the purely utilitarian details of the Van Trevvor Jones menage were spirited into the building swathed under many layers of packing.

One would naturally say, in view of all this, what a terrible, what an utterly ghastly job it must be to collect the rents in Four-flush row—but that is the strangest thing about Four-flush row; for, apparently, it was no trouble at all to Harry Kelly to collect the rents there.

True, before the advent of the mild-eyed, soft-spoken young Irishman there had been all sorts of trouble incident to the collection of rents in the building—but Harry had changed all that. Seemingly he enjoyed the task hugely; never did he have to leave without all of the rents being paid in full. Down at the real estate office which controlled Four-flush row this was considered a miracle. Time and time again they questioned Harry as to his miraculous methods of procedure, and always Harry only smiled, for that was the best thing Harry did.

"Well, you got a case now," remarked Henry Bryce, manager of the real estate firm that employed Harry. Harry smiled and leaned back in his swivel chair.

"Yep, I let the Van Trevvor Joneses, biggest dead beats in town, have an apartment in Four-flush row. Wouldn't have done it, only you're so lucky at collecting I thought maybe you could collect even from them. But if you can, I'll say you're the only collector in town who ever has; they're the worst dead beats in the whole city." Harry smiled again.

"Oh, I guess I won't have any trouble," he said, confidently.

"How on earth do you do it?" probed Henry for the hundredth time. "I can't understand it at all. You haven't any of the qualities of a born collector. Your voice is weak, your chin is conciliatory, you never get sore, you're always polite—it's a mystery!"

"Oh, they just pay me," said Harry, and that was what he always said when questioned along these lines.

The first of the month rolled around and the tenants in Four-flush row made their usual verbose explanations to the neighbors, but they all, every last one of them, got their rent ready for the terrible, blue-eyed Irishman who continually wore a smile, never raised his voice in anger, but always collected; that is, they all had their rent except Van Trevvor Jones—who didn't know Harry. In due course Harry arrived at the Van Trevvor Jones door and rang the bell. A maid ushered him into the presence of Mrs. Van Trevvor Jones, who motioned him to be seated with grandiose gesture.

"The rent, ah, yes, the rent; I had quite forgotten that this was the first of the month—you see, Mr. Van Trevvor is heavily interested just now in a project to buy immense interests in Hindustan for this government and so he is quite likely to overlook small matters—could you call later in the evening when he is at home? Harry smiled.

"Certainly, Mrs. Van Trevvor, no trouble at all—don't worry about it. It is, indeed, as you say, a very small matter—I shall call this evening and see your husband, for the fact of the matter is I am quite jealous of the pleasure of meeting so distinguished a person."

Harry went, but he came back that evening, and the smile was still in evidence as he was ushered into the presence of Mr. Van Trevvor.

"I'm very sorry, my boy," began that worthy, "but you see, I have tied up ever cent, temporarily, in a vast project that will—" Suddenly a look of alarm crept softly into Harry's blue eyes. He leaned forward and put his hand upon Mr. Van Trevvor's arm.

"Look here, sir, you can't fool me; you're in trouble. I know that you are in trouble. You look positively ghastly; you've been worrying. You're trying to make me think that things are all right—but I know that they are not—my heart goes out to you in your extremity—I shall help you. Horrors! I have known men in your position to commit—but no—we won't mention it. Don't you let yourself be despondent, sir; I will fix everything—you just stop worrying and I'll see that your rent is taken care of this month; I wouldn't want for the world to think that I had been instrumental in driving a man to . . ." Harry looked as though he were going to weep. Van Trevvor Jones' mouth hung slightly agape; he stared and said nothing.

"You just forget the rent," went on Harry, sympathy engraved deeply upon his earnest young face. "I'll go to each tenant in the building, this month, and tell them that you are up against it and need help—they'll respond—they're such dear, kind souls; every one of them will respond—you'll see; each one will contribute a little—and between them all we'll raise your rent—I'll start the contributions off with a five-dollar donation myself and—" At last the full horror of the thing struck Jones. He rose unsteadily from his chair.

"Young man, if you do that I'll—I'll—"

"There, there," interrupted Harry, "don't mention it; I know you're grateful; you don't have to thank me —I'll go now, and before another hour is up I will have collected the entire—"

"Stop!" shrieked Mr. Jones as Harry started for the door. "Stop! Stop! you fool; come back here!" Money changed hands.

Henry Bryce eyed his collector amusedly as that youth came in from the day's collection; he was waiting the outburst he felt sure would come. None came.

"Do you mean to tell me," he probed at last, unable to withhold his curiosity longer, "that you collected from that Jones fellow?"

"Why certainly," said Harry cheerily. "I found him a most engaging gentleman—no difficulty at all."

"Well, I'll be d—d!" said Henry Bryce as he sank back into his chair.

New Use for Celluloid

Celluloid has been successfully made to take the place of tracing paper and it does this service in a very superior manner. It is reduced to a thickness of fifteen one-thousandths of an inch with a mat surface on one side and it is especially useful for plans, maps and diagrams where it is to be subjected to frequent handling and where additions and alterations are to be made. It is stored flat when not in use and may be placed sheet upon sheet without the necessity of making use of separators.

Leaving It to Nature

Doris is the eleven-year-old daughter of the suburban lady and has the Saturday morning task of sweeping and washing the front porch. On Saturday morning recently the sky looked as if it were about to burst and deluge the earth. Doris swept the porch and proceeded to take herself off to play with a neighbor's little girl.

"Doris," said her mother, "have you forgotten to wash the porch?"

"No," said Doris, as she superficially scanned the sky. "I think I'll let nature take its course."—Iris Star.

CHILDREN'S NURSE RESUMES HER DUTIES

Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for some time and I would not be without it in the house. As I am a children's nurse, I have to be on my feet a great deal and your medicine has helped me wonderfully. I was hardly able to do my housework when I began taking it, and now I am a strong and well woman, able to do all that and go out nursing besides. I have also used the Sanative Wash and found it beneficial."—Mrs. Gertrude L. Stewart, 103 Davis St., Greenfield, Mass.

Valuable for Weakness

"I have found Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a valuable medicine for weakness."—Mrs. J. A. Pietsch, Box 397, Lancaster, Pa.

Hundreds of letters like these are received by the Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Mass. Grateful women from Pennsylvania to Washington, from Texas to Illinois and from Rhode Island to Nebraska say that their health has improved since taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Peaks Long Defied Mountain Climbers

The first attempt to ascend Mount Chimborazo in Ecuador, then thought to be the highest peak in South America, was commenced 124 years ago by Humboldt, the eminent scientist, and his companions. They reached a height of 18,576 feet above sea level, when, with blood gushing from eyes, lips and mouth and almost frozen, they were forced to begin the return journey.

A narrow, deep valley also prevented them from going on to the summit, 1,922 feet higher. In 1831 Boussingault and Hall attempted the feat but failed, and it was not accomplished until 1881, when Edward Whymper made the topmost peak.

It has since been found that South America's loftiest mountain is Aconcagua, in Chile, which is 23,097 feet, and is the ninth highest mountain in the world, and the loftiest in the New world. Husacan, in Peru, and no less than six mountains in Bolivia, are higher than Chimborazo, and the latter is 189 feet higher than Mount McKinley, in Alaska, the highest mountain in North America.—Chicago Journal.

Daniel Guggenheim, who recently gave $2,500,000 to aeronautics, condemned extravagance at a luncheon in New York.

Robbins was stuck at a little crossroads junction with a train two hours late. He went into the one eating place in the village for lunch.

"Whata y' want?" the waitress asked him as he sat down on the high stool.

"Let me see your bill of fare," Robbins requested.

"Ain't none," she informed him. "Whata y' want?"

"Well, what have you?" Robbins asked.

"Beef or pork, coffee or milk," the girl rattled off. "But the pork's all gone an' th' milk's sour. Whata y' want?"

It was then that Baree found himself at the side of Maheegun. She was panting; her red tongue hung from her open jaws; but at his presence she brought her fangs together with a snap and slunk from him into the heart of the wind-run and disappointed pack. The wolves were in an ugly temper, but Baree did not sense the fact. Nepeese had trained him to take to water like an otter, and he did not understand why this narrow river should stop them as it had. He ran down to the water and stood belly deep in it, facing for an instant the horde of savage beasts above him, wondering why they did not follow. And he was black—black! He came among them again, and for the first time they noticed him.

The restless movements of the waters ceased now. A new and wondering interest held them rigid. Fangs closed sharply. A little in the open Baree saw Maheegun, with a big gray wolf standing near her. He went to her again, and this time she remained with flattened ears until he was sniffing her neck. And then, with a vicious snarl, she snapped at him. Her teeth sank deep in the soft flesh of his shoulder, and at the unexpectedness and pain of her attack, he let out a yelp. The next instant the big gray wolf was at him.

Again caught unexpectedly, Baree went down with the wolf's fangs at his throat. But in him was the blood of Kazan, the flesh and bone and sinew of Kazan, and for the first time in his life he fought as Kazan fought on that terrible day at the top of the Sun rock. He was young, he had yet to learn the cleverness and the strategy of the veteran; but his jaws were like the iron clamps with which Pierrot set his bear traps, and in his heart was sudden and blinding rage, a desire to kill that rose above all sense of pain or fear.

That fight, if it had been fair, would have been a victory for Baree, even in his youth and inexperience. In fairness the pack should have waited; it was a law of the pack to wait—until one was done for. But Baree was black; he was a stranger, an interloper, a creature whom they noticed now in a moment when their blood was hot with the rage and disappointment of killers who had missed their prey. A second wolf sprang in, striking Baree treacherously from the flank; and while he was in the snow, his jaws crushing the foreleg of his first foe, the pack was on him en masse.

Such an attack on the young caribou bull would have meant death in less than a minute. Every fang would have found its hold. Baree, by the fortunate circumstance that he was under his first two assailants and protected by their bodies, was saved from being torn instantly into pieces. He knew that he was fighting for his life. Over him the horde of beasts rolled and twisted and snarled; he felt the burning pain of teeth sinking into his flesh; he was smothered; a hundred knives seemed cutting him into pieces; yet no sound—not a whimper or a cry—came from him now in the horror and hopelessness of it all.

It would have ended in another half-minute had the struggle not been at the very edge of the bank. Undermined by the erosion of the spring floods, a section of the bank suddenly gave way, and with it went Baree and the pack. In a flash Baree thought of the water and the escaping caribou. For a bare instant the cave-in had sent him free of the pack, and in that space he gave a single leap over the gray backs of his enemies into the deep water of the stream. Close behind him half a dozen jaws snapped shut on empty air. As it had saved the caribou, so this strip of water shimmering in the glow of the moon and stars had saved Baree.

The stream was not more than a hundred feet in width, but it cost Baree close to a losing struggle to get across it. Until he dragged himself out on the opposite shore, the extent of his injuries was not impressed upon him fully. One hind leg, for the time, was useless; his forward left shoulder was laid open to the bone; his head and body were torn and cut; and as he dragged himself slowly away from the stream, the trail he left in the snow was a red path of blood. It trickled from his panting jaws, between which his tongue was bleeding; it ran down his legs and flanks and belly, and it dripped from his ears, one of which was slit clean for two inches as though cut with a knife. His instincts were dazed, his perception of things clouded as if by a veil drawn close over his eyes. Half dead, he dragged himself on until by chance he came to a clump of dwarf spruce. Into this he struggled, and then he dropped exhausted.

All that night and until noon the next day Baree lay without moving. The fever burned in his blood; it flamed high and swift toward death; then it ebbed slowly, and life conquered. At noon he came forth. He was weak, and he wobbled on his legs. His hind leg still dragged, and he was racked with pain. But it was a splendid day. The sun was warm; the snow was thawing, the sky was like a great blue sea; and the floods of life coursed warmly through Baree's veins. But now, for all time, his desires were changed, and his great quest at an end.

A red ferocity grew in Baree's eyes as he snarled in the direction of last night's fight with the wolves. They were no longer his people. They were no longer of his blood. Never again could the hunt-call lure him or the voice of the pack rouse the old longing. In him there was a thing newborn, an undying hatred for the wolf, a hatred that was to grow in him until it became like a disease in his vitals, a thing ever present and insistent, demanding vengeance on their kind. Last night he had gone to them a comrade. Today he was an outcast. Cut and maimed, bearing with him scars for all time, he had learned his lesson of the wilderness. Tomorrow, and the next day, and for days after that without number, he would remember the lesson well.

Chapter X

At the cabin on the Gray Loon, on the fourth night of Baree's absence, Pierrot was smoking his pipe after a great supper of caribou tenderloin he had brought in from the trail, and Nepeese was listening to his tale of the remarkable shot he had made, when a sound at the door interrupted them. Nepeese opened it, and Baree came in. Three days and nights of hunger in which he could not hunt because of the leg that dragged had put on him the marks of starvation. Battle-scarred and covered with dried blood-clots that still clung tenaciously to his long hair, he was a sight that drew at last a long breath from Nepeese. A queer smile was growing in Pierrot's face as he leaned forward in his chair; and then slowly rising to his feet, and looking closer, he said to Nepeese:

"Ventre Saint Gris! Oui, he has been to the pack, Nepeese, and the pack turned on him. It was not a two-wolf fight—non! It was the pack. He is cut and torn in fifty places. And —mon Dieu, he is alive!"

Over Went Baree and Half the Pack.

In Pierrot's voice there was growing wonder and amazement. He was incredulous, and yet he could not disbelieve what his eyes told him. What had happened was nothing short of a miracle, and for a time he uttered not a word more but remained staring in silence while Nepeese woke from her astonishment to give Baree doctoring and food. After the pain and hunger and treachery of his adventure, it was a wonderful homecoming for Baree. He slept that night at the foot of the Willow's bed. The next morning it was the cool caress of his tongue on her hand that awakened her.

With this day they resumed the comradeship interrupted by Baree's temporary desertion. The attachment was greater than ever on Baree's part. It was he who had run away from the Willow, who had deserted her at the call of the pack, and it seemed at times as though he sensed the depths of his perfidy and was striving to make amends. There was indubitably a very great change in him. He hung to Nepeese like a shadow. Instead of sleeping at night in the spruce shelter Pierrot made for him, he made himself a little hollow in the earth close to the cabin door. Pierrot thought that he understood, and Nepeese thought that she understood still more; but in reality the key to the mystery remained with Baree himself. He no longer played as he had played before he went off alone into the forest. He did not chase sticks, or run until he was winded, for the pure joy of running. His puppyishness was gone. In its place was a great worship and a rankling bitterness, a love for the girl and a hatred for the pack and all that it stood for.

Whenever he heard the wolf-howl, it brought an angry snarl into his throat, and he would bare his fangs until even Pierrot would draw a little away from him. But a touch of the girl's hand would quiet him.

In a week or two the heavier snows came, and Pierrot began making his trips over the trap-lines. Nepeese had entered into a thrilling bargain with him this winter. Pierrot had taken her into partnership. Every fifth trap, every fifth deadfall, and every fifth poison-bait was to be her own, and what they caught or killed was to bring a bit nearer to realization a wonderful dream that was growing in the Willow's soul. Pierrot had promised. If they had great luck that winter, they would go down together on the last snows to Nelson House and buy the little old organ that was for sale there; and if the organ was sold, they would work another winter, and get a new one.

This plan gave Nepeese an enthusiastic and tireless interest in the trap-line. Pierrot impressed on her that it made a comrade and co-worker of her on the trail. That was his scheme: to keep her with him when he was away from the cabin. He knew that Bush McTaggart would come again to the Gray Loon, probably more than once during the winter. He had swift dogs, and it was a short journey. And when McTaggart came, Nepeese must not be at the cabin—alone.

Pierrot's trap-line swung into the north and west, covering in all a matter of fifty miles, with an average of two traps, one deadfall, and a poison-bait to each mile. Halfway over this line Pierrot had built a small log cabin, and at the end of it another, so that a day's work meant twenty-five miles. This was easy for Pierrot, and not hard on Nepeese after the first few days.

All through October and November they made the trips regularly, making the round every six days, which gave one day of rest at the cabin on the Gray Loon and another day in the cabin at the end of the trail. They were splendid months. Fur was thick, and it was steadily cold without bad storm. Nepeese not only carried a small pack on her shoulders in order that Pierrot's load might be lighter, but she trained Baree to bear tiny shoulder-panniers which she manufactured. In these panniers Baree carried the bait.

In at least a third of the total number of traps set there was always what Pierrot called trash—rabbits, owls, whisky-jacks, jays and squirrels. These, with the skin or feathers stripped off, made up the bulk of the bait for the traps ahead.

One afternoon early in December, as they were returning to the Gray Loon, Pierrot stopped suddenly a dozen paces ahead of Nepeese and stared at the snow. A strange snowshoe trail had joined their own and was heading toward the cabin. For half a minute Pierrot was silent and scarcely moved a muscle as he stared. The trail came straight out of the north—and off there was Lac Bain. Also they were the marks of large snowshoes, and the stride indicated was that of a tall man. Before Pierrot had spoken, Nepeese had guessed what they meant.

"M'sieu the Factor from Lac Bain!" she said.

Baree was sniffing suspiciously at the strange trail. They heard the low growl in his throat, and Pierrot's shoulders stiffened.

"Yes, the M'sieu," he said.

The Willow's heart beat more swiftly as they went on. She was not afraid of McTaggart, not physically afraid; and yet something rose up in her breast and choked her at thought of his presence on the Gray Loon. Why was he there? It was not necessary for Pierrot to answer the question, even had she given voice to it. She knew. The Factor from Lac Bain had no business there—except to see her. The blood burned red in her cheeks as she thought again of that minute on the edge of the chasm when he had almost crushed her in his arms. Would he try that again?

Deodorizing Cigar Box Completely Is Difficult

If the cigar box is made from Spanish cedar, as the good ones are supposed to be made, it would be rather difficult to deodorize it completely, since the odor is due to a resin in the wood which is fairly well distributed throughout the wood structure. If the box is made from some other wood which does not have much natural odor, but which may have taken up some odor from the tobacco, it might be that a thorough airing or perhaps washing with gasoline would remove the odor. The odor of Spanish cedar is due to a volatile oil in the resin, and this oil can be removed at least from the surface of the wood by steaming. Since, however, a very little steaming might warp the box or discolor it, or soften the glue, this method is not practical. Probably long-continued exposure to the air and sunlight is the most practical method.

Thought in Lower Animals

Just as the monkey or orang-utan behave and think precisely as men do, so we find many animals, birds and insects thinking, and it is this capacity to benefit by the teachings of experience, the cultivation of memories and the power to reason clearly, quickly and logically that enables them to find ways and means for securing themselves in comfort during the coldest days of winter.

They do this in innumerable ways, and many species appear to exhibit greater intelligence and foresight than man in preparing for the winter season.

He Had Just the Thing

The smiling young man had entered the office and inquired if he was addressing Mr. Jones.

"No, my name's Williams," said the man at the desk, resuming his work.

The young man asked to be pardoned for the intrusion, and departed, leaving the door wide open.

"Say," spoke up the man at the desk, "come back and close the door!"

Smilingly the young man came back and took from his bag a mechanical device. "Here," he said, "is the best door-closer made. Closes without a bang and is guaranteed for ten years."

Who Wants Higher Taxes?

Ask the question, the answer will be "NOBODY".

However, in the past decade the rapidly climbing cost of government has annually called for more and more funds from the taxpayer. This is a tremendous burden and any assistance in carrying the load is appreciated, no doubt.

The Electric Light and Power Companies are among the heaviest taxpayers of the country, and are carrying a goood part of this heavy burden of government.

These figures are interesting:

According to latest federal census, Electric Light and Power Companies paid $6.80 in taxes out of every $100 of their entire income. This was greater than any other public utility.

For each $100 which the Light Companies had invested, they paid $2.24 in taxes. These figures are for 1922, the last covered by federal census, and indicate that the amount of taxes paid were $73,773,000. It is estimated that in the last year these same companies paid $150,000,000 in all forms of taxes. This amounts to $8.00 per family.

If all of these plants in the United States were publicly owned it would mean that every family would have a tax boost of $8.00 to make up the deficit created by cutting off the present source of income.

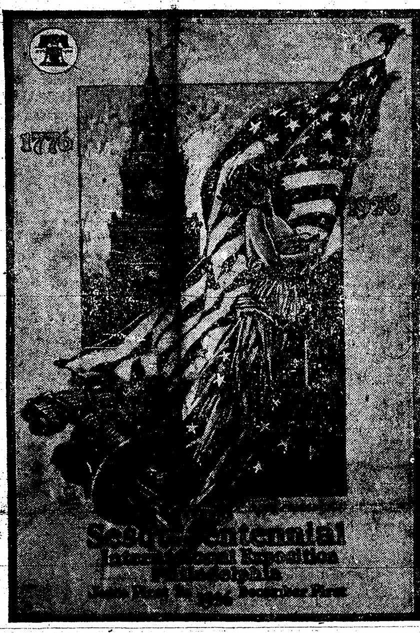
Where Will You Celebrate?

THE VOICE OF THE LIBERTY BELL



This is one of the two new official posters of the Sesqui-Centennial International Exposition, opening in Philadelphia June 1 to celebrate 150 years of American Independence. The Exposition will continue to December 1. Dan Smith, the artist, has symbolized the epoch in history which the tolling of the Liberty Bell in Independence Hall, July 4, 1776, marked and has depicted the growth of the United States from the original thirteen states, represented by the thirteen stars which emerge from the mouth of the Liberty Bell.

Leo Horien made a trip out in the country Monday and bought up about 3000 pounds of wool from the farmers around here. He hauled the wool to Thief River Falls on Tuesday.

Justice Carlson of Warren was in town the forepart of this week and unloaded a carload of culverts for the county. He hauled most of the culverts out near Grygla.

S. E. Reierson, Racine Olson and Olaf Eide made a business trip to Newfolden Sunday. While there Mr. Reierson traded off his Overland touring car for a Mitchel touring.

The best of flour is Rex.

Geo. Fricker spent Sunday at St. Hilaire visiting with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. M. Fricker. While there he made a deal with J. D. Porter in which he traded away his his Ford touring for a new Chevrolet coach.

Mrs. Andrew Nelson and chauffer, Edward Nelson, and sisters, Gertrude, Aveline and Emma, and Mr. and Mrs. Ed Severson all of Windom, Minn., came last week for a few days visit at the Mrs. T. Bottom home. Mrs. Nelson is the daughter of Mrs. Bottom and Mrs. Severson is a sister.

They came up by car but the last leg of their journey from Holt and out to the Bottom place was made by team and wagon driven by Ludwig Sagstuen. As they hit here right after the heavy rains that we had the side roads were in poor shape.

BANKERS RAISE FUND OF $500,000 FOR EDUCATION

A fund of $500,000 to endow scholarships and research in economics in American colleges was recently established by the American Bankers Association in celebration of its Golden Anniversary. The intention of the Foundation is to promote education in the direction of sounder general economic understanding. Half the total sum represents subscriptions by the American Bankers Association, the American Institute of Banking and individual bankers, and the other half quotas assigned to bankers in each state. The Association gave $50,000 from its reserve funds, and the American Institute of Banking, through individual subscriptions from its members, who are chiefly clerks in the banks, subscribed $25,000. Numerous subscriptions of $5,000, $2,500 and $1,000 each were made by individual bankers in all parts of the country.

PLANS COMPLETD FOR THE MARSHALL COUNTY FAIR

Favorable Weather Conditions Will Bring Thousands to Warren July 5, 6 and 7.

Plans are now being completed Marshall county's twetieth annual fair and mammoth oourt of July celebration to be held in Warren next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday and with weather conditions right large crowds will be present each day.

Exhibit buildings are this week undergoing a thorough house cleaning by workers for the fair association in preparation to take care of the hundreds of exhibitors expected to show here during the fair.

Among the most noteworthy exhibits will be that entered by the boys and girls club members from all parts of the county who will compete for cash prizes and free trips to the State fair and Junior Livestock show at South St. Paul. The Rural school exhibit will also be larger and better than in former years, with many articles made by rural school children already received in Warren.

The livestock exhibit, which has always been one of the main drawing card of the fair, promises this year to be bigger, better than ever. Only breeders from Marshall and adjoining counties, will be permitted .o show and compete for the prize money. The Women's department will be well filled with beautiful things the women of the county make:

Entertainment features of the fair will be practically as announced last week, and Marshall county people are urged not to miss the opportunity they will now have in seeing some of the highest class entertainment ever exhibited in the county. Auto races, free acts, big parade July 5. dancing, gorgeous display of fireworks on the evenings of July 5 and 6 and three big ball games are just a few of the features for the entertainment of the visitors.

"There will be something for everyone to do every minute they spend at the fair," said John A. Grindeland, secretary of the fair association, "and we have left nothing unturned for making everyone happy at this fair."

Pierrot, deep in his own somber thoughts, scarcely heard the strange laugh that came suddenly from her lips. Nepeese was listening to the growl that was again in Baree's throat. It was a low but terrible sound. When half a mile from the cabin, she unslung the panniers from his shoulders and carried them herself. Ten minutes later they saw a man advancing to meet them.

It was not McTaggart. Pierrot recognized him, and with an audible breath of relief waved his hand. It was DeBar, who trapped in the Barren Country north of Lac Bain. Pierrot knew him well. They had exchanged fox-poison. They were friends and there was pleasure in the grip of their hands. DeBar stared then at Nepeese.

"Tonnerre, she has grown into a woman!" he cried, and like a woman Nepeese looked at him straight, with the color deepening in her cheeks as he bowed low with a courtesy that dated back a couple of centuries beyond the trap-line.

DeBar lost no time in explaining his mission, and before they reached the cabin Pierrot and Nepeese knew why he had come. M'sieu, the Factor at Lac Bain, was leaving on a journey in five days, and he had sent DeBar as a special messenger to request Pierrot to come up to assist the clerk and the half-breed storekeeper in his absence. Pierrot made no comment at first. But he was thinking. Why had Bush McTaggart sent for him? Why had he not chosen some one nearer? Not until a fire was crackling in the sheet-iron stove in the cabin, and Nepeese was busily engaged getting supper, did he voice these questions to the fox-hunter.

DeBar shrugged his shoulders.

"He asked me, at first, if I could stay. But I have a wife with a bad lung, Pierrot. It was caught by frost last winter, and I dare not leave her long alone. He has great faith in you. Besides, you know all the trappers on the Company's books at Lac Bain. So he sent for you, and begs you not to worry about your fur-lines, as he will pay you double what you would catch in the time you are at the Post."

"And—Nepeese?" said Pierrot. "M'sieu expects me to bring her?"

From the stove the Willow bent her head to listen, and her heart leaped free again at DeBar's answer.

"He said nothing about that. But surely—it will be a great change for li'le m'selle."

Pierrot nodded.

"Possibly, Netootam."

They discussed the matter no more that night. But for hours Pierrot was still, thinking, and a hundred times he asked himself the same question: Why had McTaggart sent for him? It must be, he told himself finally, that M'sieu had sent for him because he wanted to win over the father of Nepeese and gain the friendship of Nepeese herself. For this was undoubtedly a very great honor that the Factor was conferring on him. And yet, deep down in his heart, he was filled with suspicion.

When DeBar was about to leave the next morning, Pierrot said:

"Tell M'sieu that I will leave for Lac Bain the day after tomorrow."

After DeBar had gone, he said to Nepeese:

"And you shall remain here, ma cherie. I will not take you to Lac Bain. I have had a dream that M'sieu will not go on a journey, but that he has lied, and that he will be sick when I arrive at the post. And yet, if it should happen that you care to go—"

Nepeese straightened suddenly, like a reed that has been caught by the wind.

"Non!" she cried, so fiercely that Pierrot laughed, and rubbed his hands.

So it happened that on the second day after the fox-hunter's visit Pierrot left for Lac Bain, with Nepeese in the door waving him good-by until he was out of sight.

* * * * * * *

On the morning of this same day Bush McTaggart rose from his bed while it was still dark. The time had come. He had hesitated at murder—at the killing of Pierrot; and in his hesitation he had found a better way. There could be no escape for Nepeese.

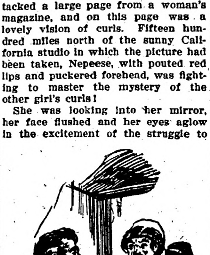
It was a wonderful scheme, so easy of accomplishment, so inevitable in its outcome. And all the time Pierrot would think he was away to the East on a mission!

He ate his breakfast before dawn, and was on the trail before it was yet light. There was a vast amount of brutal satisfaction to McTaggart in anticipating what was about to happen, and he reveled in it to the full. There was no chance for disappointment. He was positive that Nepeese would not accompany her father to Lac Bain. She would be at the cabin on the Gray Loon—alone.

This aloneness was to Nepeese burdened with no thought of danger. There were times, now, when the thought of being alone was pleasant to her, when she wanted to dream by herself, when she visioned things into the mysteries of which she would not admit even Pierrot. She was growing into womanhood—just the sweet, closed bud of womanhood as yet—still a girl with the soft velvet of girlhood in her eyes, yet with the mystery of woman stirring gently in her soul, as if the Great Hand were hesitating between awakening her and letting her sleep a little longer. At these times, when the opportunity came to steal hours by herself, she would put on the red dress and do up her wonderful hair as she saw it in the pictures of the magazines Pierrot had sent up twice a year from Nelson House.

On the second day of Pierrot's absence Nepeese dressed herself like this, but today she let her hair cascade in a shining glory about her, and about her forehead bound a circlet of red ribbon. She was not yet done. Today she had marvelous designs. On the wall close to her mirror she had tacked a large page from a woman's magazine, and on this page was a lovely vision of curls. Fifteen hundred miles north of the sunny California studio in which the picture had been taken, Nepeese, with pouted red lips and puckered forehead, was fighting to master the mystery of the other girl's curls!

She was looking into her mirror, her face flushed and her eyes aglow in the excitement of the struggle to fashion one of the coveted ringlets from a tress that fell away below her hips, when the door opened behind her, and Bush McTaggart walked in.



"Tell M'sieu That I Will Leave, the Day After Tomorrow."

Chapter XI

The Willow's back was toward the door when the Factor from Lac Bain entered the cabin, and for a few startled seconds she did not turn. Her first thought was of Pierrot—for some reason he had returned. But even as this thought came to her, she heard in Baree's throat a snarl that brought her suddenly to her feet, facing the door.

McTaggart was standing with his back against the door; and at Nepeese—in her wonderful dress and flowing hair—he was staring as if stunned for a space at what he saw. Fate, or accident, was playing against the Willow now. If there had been a spark of slumbering chivalry, of mercy, even, in Bush McTaggart's soul, it was extinguished by what he saw. Never had Nepeese looked more beautiful, not even on that day when MacDonald the map-maker had taken her picture. The sun, flooding through the window, lighted up her marvelous hair; her flushed face was framed in its lustrous darkness like a tinted cameo. He had dreamed, but he had pictured nothing like this woman who stood before him now, her eyes widening with fear and the flush leaving her face even as he looked at her.

It was not a long interval in which their eyes met in that terrible silence—terrible to the girl. Words were unnecessary. At last she understood—understood what her peril had been that day at the edge of the chasm and in the forest, when fearlessly she had played with the menace that was confronting her now.

A breath that was like a sob broke from her lips.

"M'sieu!" she tried to say. But it was only a gasp—an effort. She seemed choking.

Plainly she heard the click of the iron bolt as it locked the door. McTaggart advanced a step.

Only a single step McTaggart advanced. On the floor Baree had remained like a carven thing. He had not moved. He had not made a sound but that one warning snarl—until McTaggart took the step. And then, like a flash, he was up and in front of Nepeese, every hair of his body on end; and at the fury in his growl McTaggart lunged back against the barred door. A word from Nepeese in that moment, and it would have been over. But an instant was lost—an instant before her cry came. In that moment man's hand and brain worked swifter than brute understanding; and as Baree launched himself at the Factor's throat, there came a flash and a deafening explosion almost in the Willow's eyes.

It was a chance shot, a shot from the hip with McTaggart's automatic. Baree fell short. He struck the floor with a thud and rolled against the log wall. There was not a kick or a quiver left in his body. McTaggart laughed nervously as he shoved his pistol back in its holster. He knew that only a brain shot could have done that.

With her back against the further wall, Nepeese was waiting. McTaggart could hear her panting breath. He advanced halfway to her.

"Nepeese, I have come to make you my wife," he said.

She did not answer. He could see that her breath was choking her. She raised a hand to her throat. He took two more steps, and stopped. He had never seen such eyes.

"I have come to make you my wife, Nepeese. Tomorrow you will go on to Nelson House with me, and then back to Lac Bain—forever." He added the last words as an afterthought. "Forever," he repeated.

He did not mince words. His courage and his determination rose as he saw her body droop a little against the wall. She was powerless. There was no escape. Pierrot was gone. Baree was dead.

He had thought that no living creature could move as swiftly as the Willow when his arms reached out for her. She made no sound as she darted under one of his outstretched arms. He made a lunge, a brutal grab, and his fingers caught a bit of hair. He heard the snap of it as she tore herself free and flew to the door. She had thrown back the bolt when he caught her and his arms closed about her. He dragged her back, and now she cried out—cried out in her despair for Pierrot, for Baree, for some miracle of God that might save her.

And Nepeese fought. She twisted in his arms until she was facing him. She could no longer see. She was smothered in her hair. It covered her face and breast and body, suffocating her, entangling her hands and arms—and still she fought. In the struggle McTaggart stumbled over the body of Baree, and they went down. Nepeese was up fully five seconds ahead of the man. She could have reached the door. But again it was her hair. She paused to fling back the thick masses of it so that she could see, and McTaggart was at the door ahead of her.

He did not lock it again, but stood facing her. His face was scratched and bleeding. He was no longer a man but a devil. Nepeese was broken, panting—a low sobbing came with her breath. She bent down, and picked up a piece of firewood. McTaggart could see that her strength was almost gone.

She clutched the stick as he approached her again. But McTaggart had lost all thought of fear or caution. He sprang upon her like an animal. The stick of firewood fell. And again fate played against the girl. In her terror and hopelessness she had caught up the first stick her hand had touched—a light one. With her last strength she struck at McTaggart with it, and as it fell on his head, he staggered back. But it did not make him loose his hold.

Dan Beard Organized American Boy Scouts

The experiences of Lieut. Gen. Sir Robert S. S. Baden Powell of the British army with boys as messengers during the Boer war in South Africa so impressed him that he came later to devote almost his entire time to work with boys. He organized the boy scouts in England, and from there the movement spread to most other countries, and the membership has grown until it now includes millions of boys.

"The boys' general," however, freely acknowledged his debt to movements of a similar character in the United States. And so, although the Boy Scouts of America were not incorporated until 1910, which was some little time after the British organization had been formed, the scouts in this country really date to a boys' organization founded by Daniel Carter Beard—Dan Beard—about 1905. This body became, with another founded by Ernest Thompson Seton, the foundation of the American scouts.

"Packing Industry"

From the beginning pork was salted down and packed in barrels, hence arose the name now given the meat industry. It is more or less a misnomer today because it applies in a greater degree to the industries of fruit and vegetable canning where packing in containers is an important feature.

THE GAME OF "TRUTH"

By PHILLIP E. STEVENSON

(©, 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)

THE Life of the Party, it seemed, had arrived just in time. The Gang was plainly in distress, judging from the sallies of forced laughter and the determinedly jaunty nature of the conversation which reached him from the parlor adjoining. While taking off his coat and hat in the hall, he felt a terrific undercurrent of strain in the air; they were just killing time until he joined them.

It was not unpleasant, he found, to feel thus indispensable to the gathering, and something within him swelled with gratification. He entered the parlor in his most nonchalant manner, however, stopped just across the threshold, and made an ironical bow.

"Gang," he said, raising his hand for silence, "we who are about to die salute you." Giggles arose from every corner of the room. "What goes on? Renewing your youth with a game of Old Bachelor's Kitchen?"

"'Truth', Clem," some one volunteered; 'member how we used to play it? One person's 'It' and has to answer all questions that the others ask—tell the truth—"

"Yeah," interrupted Clem, broadly sarcastic. "I remember, all right. 'Truth!' The biggest liar wins! This kind of stuff: 'Orville, me lad, do you practice your smile before the mirror?' 'Nope, honest to Gawd—never!' Or this: 'Lucinda, my chee-ild, have you ever been kissed?' 'Oh, yeh, often—by pa and Brother Freddy. Nobody else. Honest-reely-and-truly-cross-me-heart-hope-to-die-if-it-ain't-true!' Yeah, I know."

The gathering volume of laughter seemed to dissipate the strain under which they had been laboring so valiantly.

"'Truth!'" he went on, capitalizing his advantage. "Lies, I guess you mean! Why, I'm the only guy that never cheats at that game."

Although this sally proved less humorous, whispers were beginning to be heard: "Let's make Clem 'It'. . . . Yeh, let's." There were a good many in the Gang, and they unanimously elected him victim of the next questions in a game of "Truth", shouting queries at him before he had fairly sat down or even noticed who was there.

"What do you think of blonds, Clem?"

"Who's your next catch, Clem?"

"Come on, Clem; who's your girl, now?"

Popular fancy was kindled by that. They clamored for Clem's girl.

". . . had so many, and no wonder . . . So comical, he is—and, my dear, so attractive! . . . Always was the Life of the Party, was Clem . . ."

Such remarks, overheard with considerable satisfaction, made Clem agreeable to any immolation as a part of the game—that is, any conspicuous immolation.

"Who is she, Clem?" they persisted. "Nothing but the truth! . . . Come on, Clem. Spill us a good line."

Clem, like the comical fellow that he was, assumed his most serious air and said: "Really, folks, this is no joking matter. A fella's heart throbs shouldn't ought to be—" thereby justifying a pause for their roar of laughter.

"Gee, everything Clem says is a scream," they shouted. They just couldn't help it. But they kept after him for the name of his girl.

"Awful serious, now, Clem. Who is she?"

There was a hush of expectancy. Each of the women was hopeful; a score of mouths prepared to smile. The Life of the Party took his time searching for a good answer. "Promise you won't tell a soul?" he said to the crowd. Their amusement of this sarcasm gave him another minute to think; then the hush descended on them once more. Finally he hit on a name sufficiently incongruous when coupled with his—the name of a "queer" girl with a hare lip, who had once been a timid member of the gang, but whose consciousness of her deformity had long made her a stranger to most of them.

Clem put a thick forefinger in his mouth, demurely closed his eyes, coyly oscillated his shoulders, wriggled in his chair like a schoolgirl—in short, went through all the accepted contortions of embarrassment, before replying.

"Suke Damer."

He was prepared for an explosion of mirth—it was all he could do to keep from smiling himself. But no explosion came. Instead, a few anticipatory giggles were suddenly suppressed by little gasps. A long uncomfortable silence was broken by a strident feminine voice behind him.

"Thinking of marrying her, Clem?"

By a quick answer, he might (he must) atone for his first unaccountable failure. As luck would have it, the answer came.

"Sure," he said confidently, "for her looks."

Strange! Again he failed; they only looked scandalized. It could not be that they resented his allusion to Suke's deformed mouth. It could not be. They themselves had certainly discussed her freely enough in former days.

But he had little time to wonder at their coldness toward his jocosity. From behind an old-fashioned, high-backed sofa where she had been sitting in silence, he saw Suke Damer rise and move toward him. There was a peculiar light in her eyes, and her right hand was held to her breast. It dropped as she stood before him and looked at him with timid animal eyes.

"Clem, did you really mean you don't mind my l— I mean my . . . this?" Her gesture was one of repugnance; her voice, almost inaudible.

Clem could not move at first. He tried to speak, but his mouth only opened and shut, soundlessly. Finally he managed to get to his feet, still dumb.

"You're the only one," she continued, now smiling faintly and beginning to blush. "The only one. But all the time I knew." Her voice went still lower. "I knew, Clem. You was always so jolly-like and full of fun, and—and so—kind! Oh, I knew, all right. . . . A minute ago, Clem—before you came they—oh, they asked me all these questions, Clem, and I told 'em—told 'em about—about you, and—how I felt about you—and—and all. . . . and they—well, they didn't laugh right out exactly, but they did like when you told 'em—kind of scared to laugh, I guess." Contempt of their cautiousness curled her mouth grotesquely. The toe of her boot made slow spirals on the faded carpet. "But we don't care about that, Clem, do we? so long as we know, you and me?" Her arm was lifted again, this time to rest on the lapel of his coat. "Clem, it's all right now, ain't it? You were on the square, wern't you, like you always are? You meant what you said, didn't you, Clem?"

Clem's mouth was working, twisting, but there were no words.

"Clem. Didn't you?"

Sweat broke out on Clem's temples. His head hung down, his shoulders stooped forward.

"Clem. Clem! Ain't you going to tell 'em? Never mind their knowing, Clem, never mind. . . . Clem! You did mean it!"

Clem raised his head. The gang instinctively leaned forward to catch the answer. How could he lie? Yet . . . it seemed almost harder to tell the truth. Again his lips opened, soundless, roundly stupid. He raised his lowered lids in an attempt to meet Suke's pleading eyes. For a fraction of a second he succeeded, but quickly turned his gaze . . . beaten . . . and sank back into his chair.

There was not a word from Suke, no cry. Simply, she turned and left the room. The gang heard her fussing with her coat a moment; a clicking sound told them she had even remembered her overshoes. . . . Then the street door opened, and in the noise of its closing they just caught the burst of a convulsive, long-smothered sob.

Extra Beatings Not Charged to Husband

However often you assault and batter your wife in a day, the law only looks upon your activities as a single case of assault. This information may be useful to husbands. It arises from a ruling by Mr. Booth at Lambeth, England, who, when told by a woman applicant with a polychromatic eye, that her lord and master had assaulted her "many times, your honor," on a certain day, was told that "one day, one assault," was the law. And that might have been that, but it wasn't.

The woman explained that she had been to the court before and had summoned her husband, but had lost her case.

"Why was that?" asked Mr. Booth.

"Well, sir," said the applicant, "I went in for a lawyer that time. He was a good lawyer, but he mixed me up proper with another case, so I never had a fair trial."

Mr. Booth smothered a smile and looked grieved. "Surely, madam," he protested, "that's a little unkind of you. Do you mean that I never gave you a fair trial?"

"Oh, no, sir," said the rainbow-eyed one eagerly. "But," she added pensively, "he certainly did hit me—hard."

"Well," said Mr. Booth, "I can do nothing, as the case has been heard once. Go home and let him hit you again, and then we'll see."

"Thank you, sir," said the woman gratefully, and trotted off to await such future batterings as her lord and master might see fit to bestow.

Remembered Instructions

"If I wave my hand," said an airplane pilot to William Bent of Washington, "it means that the machine is in danger and you must jump." They took off and soon after the pilot remembered he had forgotten to say goodby to his family. He descended to within a few hundred feet of his home and caused the machine to fly in a series of circles. Meanwhile, he waved his hand energetically. As he turned to see if his passenger was secure he was horrified to observe the latter with one leg thrown over the seat, about to jump with a parachute. He was barely able to keep him in the plane.

Carlotta's Red Poppy

The common red poppy was once used very adroitly by the Empress Carlotta, wife of the ill-fated Maximilian of Mexico. Napoleon III had objected, through his ambassador, to her selection of red as the color of the new Mexican order, observing that it was already widely known as the color of the ribbon of the Legion of Honor. The empress replied by sending Napoleon a red poppy, with a note that the Order of Nature took precedence of the Order of the Legion of Honor, and that she had chosen her ribbon from the color of the poppy.

Salesgirls Dread Bargain Days

Louisa was tired. From morning until night she had been on her feet in the busy department store. No matter how she felt, she must serve her customers with a smile. Her head throbbed and her feet ached. Week after week, she felt her strength ebbing until she was in a run-down condition, not fit to work.

"My mother suggested that I try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound," she writes. "I took only three bottles and it brought me about all right." Through the Vegetable Compound, she found better health to do her work and she told the other girls about it.

That was several years ago. Louisa is now Mrs. L. G. Van Dyke of 1246 Spring St., Morrell Park, Baltimore, Md. She is the mother of three healthy, active children. She says that she found the tonic effect of the Vegetable Compound helpful to her during this critical period.

Every working girl knows that to do her work properly and easily she must have good health. She can not afford to lose time from her work.

Girls who suffer from weakness and run down condition should try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Ask your neighbor.

CLAIMS DISCOVERY OF NEW ELEMENT

Scientist Declares Substance Is Radioactive.

Cornish, Me.—A new radioactive element is alleged to have been discovered by Dr. William Teg of Cornish, formerly of New York, director of a biological research institute here, which he founded.

Doctor Teg declares he has succeeded in isolating this element, which he calls brodium, after 16 years' work in the United States and abroad. The substance is an alkali, said to be closely related to the sodium and potassium groups.

Brodium is found principally in mineral form, and the pure element is described as a brownish-gray substance which smells like pungent earth and is soluble. The metal has an atomic weight of 2.25, slightly more than radium, plus.

It is everywhere present, the doctor declares, and acts against gravity. Radioactivity, it is stated, causes it to give off what the doctor has termed "terrestrial rays" and these rays, he believes, supply energy to all living things. The rays are said to cause the capillary action by which plant life feeds on its sap, and provide the nervous energy for the human body.

The doctor's theory is that brodium, a widely distributed element, gives off rays to all forms of life. Plants assimilate these rays through their roots and leaves, and the element being more active in water, the action is facilitated in the sap. The human body absorbs the rays, which are everywhere in the air, through the nerve tips.

Doctor Teg says that various scientists have investigated and several are now working with him looking into the new element. He mentions the Atomic Research association of Detroit as investigating his findings and scientists in Kansas City as making experiments.

His own labortory is an old farmhouse which he has improved himself.

BENDING MARBLE

Tests that the bureau of standards is making show that a specimen of marble when subjected to great pressure stretches or gives to a certain degree without breaking. This photograph shows D. W. Kessler conducting the so-called flexure test with a machine which was designed for the purpose.

U. S. Wild Life Doomed, Says Zoological Expert

New York.—Civilization will wipe out the wild life of America—mammals, birds, fish—unless protective measures are taken, in the opinion of Dr. William T. Hornaday, who retired recently after 30 years of service as director of the New York zoological park, popularly known as "The Bronx Zoo."

Doctor Hornaday, who is now seventy-one years old, issues this warning after looking backward over his half-century of intimate observation of wild creatures. As remedial measures, Doctor Hornaday recommends the establishment of more game sanctuaries and further limitation of the hunter's bag limit.

Here's Scale That Can Weigh Dot Over an i

Milwaukee, Wis.—If interested, you can have the weight of the dot over an i measured accurately by means of a scale received at the Marquette university school of medicine by Dr. Joseph C. Bock, head of the department of pathological chemistry.

Doctor Bock, to illustrate the fineness of the weighing machine, took a sheet of paper and wrote a name thereon, leaving the letter i undotted. He then weighed the paper, making a perfect balance by use of aluminum hairwire weights. Then he dotted the i. When the paper was returned to the scale the balance was disturbed and the difference found to be two one-hundred thousandths of a grain.

The scale is a marvel of German mechanical skill, and is the invention of a scientist named Neimetz.

POWER BOATS DUE TO RULE MISSOURI

New Type of Navigation Replaces Steamboat.

Kansas City, Mo.—When the little blue-winged teal first took the water on the Missouri river ages ago, it began navigation history on the "Big Muddy" that soon is to see another step in its evolution.

The Indian with his canoe, the half-civilized voyager with his pirogue, the fur trader with his keel boat and the "dingey" or little steamboat with a single boiler and engine successively toiled up and down the treacherous river, each marking a step forward in navigation.

Steamboat Once "King."

The magnificent steamboat of the '50s, that great floating palace that marked the heyday of steamboating on the Missouri, held sway for a decade or more and with its passing river traffic halted. Now is to come the power boat and string of freight-laden barges. This modern means of river commerce is to be made possible by a channel improvement program extending over five years, whereby approximately $2,000,000 will be spent the first year between Kansas City and St. Louis.

The first attempt to navigate the Missouri by steam was made in 1819. It was a hazardous undertaking. Besides the danger of the river, which needed the most skilled navigation because of snags, sandbars and tortuous channel, there was the danger of the lurking savage, concealed in the grass along the river banks ready to open fire on the boatmen without warning.

The Western Engineer, a small steamboat 75 feet long, was the fist to ascend the river as far as Council Bluffs, which it reached September 17, 1819. It was built expressly to awe the Indian. On the bow, running from the keelson forward, was a large steam escape pipe, made in imitation of a serpent. The pipe was painted black and the mouth of it red, and clouds of steam belched forth as the little ship crawled upstream at the rate of three miles an hour.

First Trip in 1831.

The first steamboat to ascend the river above Council Bluffs was the Yellowstone of the American Fur company, which left St. Louis April 16, 1831, and reached the mouth of the Bad river in South Dakota, on June 19. The following year the Yellowstone ascended to the mouth of the Yellowstone river, thus demonstrating the claim long made by army engineers that the Missouri was navigable that far.

Traffic on the "Big Muddy" flourished after 1830 and was at its height between 1850 and 1860. Lines of noble boats plied the stream, making possible the military and trading posts of the ever-extending frontier.

New Shenandoah Park Has Fountain of Youth

Luray, Va.—Gurgling through sands and flint rock of pearly whiteness, the waters of a spring in the foothills of the Blue Ridge of this county, an analysis just made reveals a specific for goiter, gout, indigestion, rheumatism and many other ailments.

Three-quarters of a century ago these waters were believed to contain curative properties for goiter, but the recent analysis shows many other diseases will yield if the waters of the spring are persistently drunk. The spring is in a separate mountain from the Blue Ridge, but in a spur of that mountain that will be embraced in the Shenandoah national park area. The owner of the land on which the spring is situated says that nature's compound will make the spring a fountain of youth to millions when the Shenandoah national park is thrown open.

Man Preaches 20 Years With Self as Audience

Samnaun, Switzerland.—For twenty years an eighty-year-old man has been preaching in a little church here with himself as his congregation.

A century ago the village was half Protestant and half Catholic. There was only one church, so the two sects agreed to use the church during alternate Sundays.

The aged man is the last survivor of the Protestant sect. He still occupies the church every second Sunday. The Catholics for years have besought him to abandon use of the church, but he refuses.

Sees Diet Adding Inch to Next Generation

Atlantic City.—"The gain of an inch in height and a corresponding increase in weight may be looked for in the next generation, because of our better diet habits," said Dr. S. J. Crumbine, general executive of the American Child Health association.

Miss Miriam Birdseye, an extension agent in nutrition of the United States Department of Agriculture, agreed with Doctor Crumbine. She said that the children of the future would have longer and stronger bones, better muscle tone, clearer skins and brighter eyes.

SHIP TAKES CARE OF SECRET CABLES

Is Really "Oculist of the Coast Artillery."

Boston.—A little gray steamship with a queer signal hanging from its masthead may be seen now and again in the great ports of eastern and southern United States. Yet thousands of travelers who view it never suspect that this vessel, the only one of its class, is vitally concerned in the defense of the American coast.

The ship is the United States steamship Joseph Henry. Its work is the maintenance of a secret system of submarine telephone cables that enables the coast artillery to train its big guns on targets out at sea. The Joseph Henry, anchored here or there or busily steaming about its business, is the only visible evidence of these underwater communication lines.

It might be appropriately called "the oculist of the coast artillery." The eyes that help find the range of distant targets are located far away from the harbor fort, sometimes on a neighboring promontory; sometimes on an island in the harbor. The cables are the nerves that carry the range-finding observations to the "brain" that fires the big batteries.

The fact that these under-water cables exist is no secret. Their exact location, however, is a military secret. They are laid so that they are out of the way of shipping lanes and anchorages. Nevertheless, every so often, some vessel fouls one of the cables, or a new cable must be laid, or a cable develops a leak.

If this situation occurs anywhere from Portland, Me., to Galveston Texas, the Joseph Henry appears on the scene. It is designated a mine layer, although it never laid a mine and probably never will.

A hundred and sixty-five feet long and displacing 601 tons, its only distinguishing characteristics are a huge reel or windlass, mounted horizontally on its forward upper deck, a big sheave on a forward boom, and another pair of sheaves at the bow.

It looks like a navy ship, but it is operated by the army, being attached to the Seventh coast artillery at Sandy Hook. The crew consists of enlisted coast artillerymen and warrant officers under Capt. T. R. Parker. It is supposed to carry a crew of 25, but the vessel is generally shorthanded. When not working, it ties up in the shadow of the Statue of Liberty at Bedloe's Island.

Find Sailors Prefer Highbrow Literature

New York.—A third mate calling on "The Lady of the Lake" and the "Lay of the Last Minstrel" to add strength to his sea-going remarks is something new under the ocean sun.

Yet these are among the softening changes wrought by the American Merchant Marine Library association, which, according to its director, Carl W. Shattuck, has scattered 250,000 books aboard 75,000 ships riding the seven seas.

"Sometimes four months at a stretch without touching shore, the sailors of the chantie are thus able to alternate their 'skipping on the decks' by 'lying down below' with books that range in choice from a Meade's First Reader or a Zane Grey thriller to Wells' 'Outline of History' or Willa Cather's 'The Professor's House.'

"There are grammars and books on 'How to Write.' They are for the young fellow on board—there's always at least one—who is going to sea just to write sea stories. They read Conrad, Captain Risenberg, and Captain McFee. The older sailor asks for books on farming, keeping the dream of a farm at the back of his head for the day when he will come ashore."

Park to Trade Zoo Animals for Birds

Los Angeles, Calif.—The howl of the bobcat and the bark of the silver fox at Fairmount park, Riverside, Calif., will soon give way to the chirp of the canary and the twittering of the nightingale, according to the action of the board of park commissioners a few days ago, when they decided to trade the animals for songbirds, provided a second party to the transaction can be found.

Commissioner Holland brought up the subject, declaring the odor of the collection of beasts at the park is objectionable and that the expense of feeding them is more than their usefulness warrants.

She further said she believed the songs of birds would be much more attractive than the less musical sounds of the animals.

Hooks Trout Wearing a Gold Watch and Fob

Saranac Lake, N. Y.—A. J. Bernard of this place believes he is the luckiest fisherman in the Adirondacks. Recently, while trout fishing in North Branch river, near Goldsmith's, he noted what appeared to be a gleam of gold amid submerged brush.

As his hook neared the bright object there was a vicious strike. The astounded fisherman found himself in possession of an eight-inch trout and a gold watch. The line had caught in the fob when the trout struck.

SUCCESS IN AMERICA AN OPEN HIGHWAY

How Four Boys of Humble Origin Have Become Chiefs of the Greatest Financial Organization in the World.

Broad highways of achievement are wide open to all in America no matter how humble their beginning, it is brought out by a writer in Forbes Magazine, telling of the successive elevation of poor boys to the chieftainship of the most powerful association of financial power in the world.

"Nowhere is opportunity so democratic as in caste-free America, nowhere is recognition for faithful service so little conditioned by inherited position and wealth," the article says. "The bounty of America in bestowing her rewards of great success upon those of modest origin is again notably manifest in the rise of Oscar Wells to the presidency of the American Bankers Association.

"The son of a tanner, John H. Puelicher, was elected to this eminence in 1922. Circumstances ended his public schooling in the seventh year and he went to work in a carpet store in Milwaukee. At sixteen he entered a bank as a clerk, rising step by step until he became president. Recognition of his abilities as a banker and civic service through public education in sound economic understanding brought him the highest reward from his profession.

"A former country school teacher, Walter W. Head, born in a farm hamlet in Western Illinois, was elected president of the association in 1923. He gave up teaching and a salary of $65 to enter banking at $40 a month in a small Missouri town. He subsequently became president of a bank in Omaha, the largest in Nebraska and a dozen neighboring states. The position he occupied in advancing agricultural welfare during the period of depression led to his being called the 'Granger President of the American Bankers Association.'

"From Irish immigrant lad to supreme head of banking in America epitomizes the career of William E. Knox, president of one of the largest savings banks of the country in New York. His business career began as an office boy in a publishing house, and he later entered the bank as a clerk. Experience with humble people in their problems of personal finance and his inculcation of economy in all matters attracted country-wide attention.

"Oscar Wells, who rises in 1925 as successor of these men, was born in an old weather-boarded log cabin house in the Missouri River bottoms of Platte County, Missouri. He became an orphan when three years of age, losing his parents in an epidemic that savaged the countryside. He passed under the care of an uncle, head of a small country bank in Platte City, a town of a few hundred inhabitants, growing up on a farm and receiving his early education in a rural school. He later entered Bethany College, West Virginia, but at the end of his junior year he had to quit college and go to work in the bank."

His subsequent career was one of steady progress, first to higher positions among small country banks, then to larger city banks in Texas, where he rose to the top. In 1914 he was chosen first governor of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank and served through the opening period of the establishment of that institution. He resigned to become president of a bank in Birmingham, Alabama, which has grown under his administration to be one of the largest and most successful institutions in the South.

"Etiquette" Extraordinary

In a box of etiquette published in 1480, directions are given as to how to grab the meat with the hands. The writer advises the use of three fingers only, and among his "don'ts" are: "Don't keep the hand too long feeling about in the dish; don't take too large a piece; don't wipe the fingers on the coat."

MAKING FARM RECORDS TALK

By D. H. OTIS
Agricultural Director, American Bankers Association.

Any one who has driven an automobile in a new country knows the value of a good road map. Farm accounts, properly kept, are a reliable road map to aid the farmer in directing the business management of his farm.

D. H. Otis

In farming communities where records have been kept in considerable number it is not uncommon to find differences in net income of $1,000 per farm between the average and the poorer farms of the community. It is also frequently found that there is a difference of over $1,000 between the average farm and a few of the better farms of the community. These differences of from $1,000 to $2,000 per farm in the net income are of vital concern to any farm in any community.

Where to Get the Facts

Farm records and inventories will reveal the reasons for these differences. The various colleges of agriculture and the United States Department of Agriculture have a collection of records and farm management surveys from which they find it possible to construct standards or guides showing actual attainments under good systems of management. Figures of this kind are available to county agents and farmers who desire to use them. It is also possible to organize farm accounting groups in a community and with the help of the College of Agriculture to develop community standards showing what the average and what the better farms are doing. These standards or examples of what the more successful farms are doing, when handled in such a way as not to divulge the identity of the owners, are a wonderful help in pointing out to the less successful farmers the weak spots in the business management of their farms.

How to Use the Facts

The farmer who keeps a careful record of the factors relating to the business management of his farm is in position to compare his farm with the average and with the best in the volume of business, as number of acres, total investment, number of cows, total receipts and total expenses. He can check on his diversity of income by comparing his income from sale of cows, sale of livestock, livestock products and sales from miscellaneous sources. His quality of business can be studied by comparing such items as income per acre or income per cow, etc.

By such a process the farmer is in position to make his records talk to him and point out the weak and the strong features in his farm operation. There is no tax that we pay today that compares with the tax we pay for our ignorance. This is true on the farm as elsewhere. Farm records, including inventories from which it is easy to form financial statements, will do wonders in reducing the tax of ignorance and placing farm business on a business basis and inspire confidence in the farmer, himself and with all those with whom he deals.

850 POUND HOG SHIPPED FROM HOFFMAN MINN

A four year old Duroc Jersey sow which tipped the scale at 850 pounds was shipped from the Hoffman yards last week by H. C. Backlund of Land through the Hoffman Shipping association. The hog was the largest and heaviest sow ever bought by the Cudahy Packing company of Newport, to which concern the shipment was made. The animal sold at an unusually high price for heavy hogs, netting 12¼ cents a pound, and bringing the price received to over $100.

STRANDQUIST FARMERS ELEVATOR BURNS

On Wednesday of last week, at about 11 o'clook in the evening, when people were hurrying home from church, the local elevator caught fire and burned down to the ground with everything it contained with the exception of a few bundles of twine that were rescued by the boys before the fire got too hot. How the fire started is a mystery, and it was not noticed before the whole engine room was in flames and a part of the elevator also.

We understand that it was covered by insurance. A carload each of twine and flour had been unloaded and stored a few days prior to the fire. Two new binders that were stored in the shed were destroyed. The elevator contained considerable grain also which was destroyed by the fire.—Strandquist Press.

FARMERS FLOCK TO COLLEGE TO GET PRACTICAL KNOWLEDGE

Diversified Farming is Given Impetus In One of the Northern Most Counties of North Dakota As Result of Annual Educational Tours Made By Tillers of Soil—Erstwhile Wheat Region Is Being Transformed.

St. Paul, Minn., June—Cavalier County, North Dakota, farmers are marching on to diversified farming with an educational program that is making the entire Flickertail State sit up and take notice of their achievements.

Until recent years this northernmost county bordering on the Canadian line was exclusively a wheat raising region most of the meat and butter the people ate was shipped in to them.

This year from the town of Langdon alone more than $100,000 worth of dairy products were shipped out of the county. This remarkable transformation has been brought about by the farmers diversifying their efforts with live stock.

In 1924 the farmers of Cavalier County established the practice of making an annual tour gathering knowledge to be applied in promoting diversification of their farming operations. Their first visit was to the Agricultural College at Fargo. Nearly 400 farmers made the trip on a special Great Northern train. They took their wives along with them so they could learn something of dairying and care of livestock. Last year these same farmers with new additions to their ranks went to the Manitoba Agricultural College at Winnipeg. About five hundred went on this educational junket.

June 25, this year, 298 of these farmers arrived in St. Paul to attend the University of Minnesota Farm School. They devoted two days in St. Paul to attend the University of Minnesota Farm School. They devoted two days in looking over the live stock, beef cattle, dairy herds, hogs, sheep, horses and experimental crop plots.

W. L. Johns, of Langdon, and R. E. Groom, Secretary of the Cavalier Fair Association, have been instrumental in organizing these annual educational excursions.

The progress in diversified farming that now is taking place on a big scale throughout this northern county of North Dakota is the most edifying development that has come to public notice, in the opinion of E. C. Leedy, General Supervisor of the Great Northern Railway, who has been engaged in promoting diversified farming more than 20 years.

Alice Sandberg came Friday from Greenbush for a few days' stay at her home here.

Harvey Burtness and family of Mckinock, N. Dak. were over Sunday visitors at the K. Burtness home.

Adolph Garey and family of Detroit, Minn. visited at the M. Udstrand home Sunday. Mr. Garey is a cousin of M. Udstrand.

Mrs. M. Unstrand returned home last Thursday from Donaldson where she has been visiting her daughter Mrs. A. Zacharias.

Andrew Bjerk returned home Tuesday from a fishing trip at Cass Lake. He also visited a few days with relatives at McIntosh.

BIG LOG DRIVE WENT OVER THE CLEMENTSON FALLS

At Clementson recently was witnessed a sight that is not likely to be seen again in this district. Five million feet of pine logs went over the dam and whirling through the swollen waters of the Clementson Rapids and out into the Rainy river. It is probably the last big drive of logs that will go over the rapids, as the pine in this county is about exhausted. Many Baudette residents were to Clementon to see the spectacular sight.

Vainly she was fighting now, not to strike him or to escape, but to get her breath. She tried to cry out again, but this time no sound came from between her gasping lips.

Again he laughed, and as he laughed, he heard the door open. Was it the wind? He turned, still holding her in his arms.

In the open door stood Pierrot.

* * * * * * *

During that terrible space which followed an eternity of time rolled slowly through the little cabin on the Gray Loon—that eternity which lies somewhere between life and death and which is sometimes meted out to a human life in seconds instead of eons.

In those seconds Pierrot did not move from where he stood in the doorway. McTaggart, huddled over with the weight in his arms, and staring at Pierrot, did not move. But the Willow's eyes were opening. And a convulsive quiver ran through the body of Baree, where he lay near the wall. There was not the sound of a breath. And then, in that silence, a great gasping sob came from Nepeese.

Then Pierrot stirred to life. He spoke, and his voice was not like Pierrot's. It was a strange voice.

"The great God has sent me back in time, m'sieu," he said. "I traveled by way of the east, and saw your trail where it turned this way."

No, that was not like Pierrot's voice! A chill ran through McTaggart now, and slowly he let go of Nepeese. She fell to the floor. Slowly he straightened.

"Is it not true, m'sieu?" said Pierrot again. "I have come in time?"

What power was it—what great fear, perhaps, that made McTaggart nod his head, that made his thick lips form huskily the words, "Yes—in time." And yet it was not fear. It was something greater, something more all-powerful than that. And Pierrot said, in that same strange voice:

"I thank the great God!"

The eyes of madman met the eyes of madman now. Between them was death. Both saw it. Both thought that they saw the direction in which its bony finger pointed. Both were certain. McTaggart's hand did not go to the pistol in his holster, and Pierrot did not touch the knife in his belt. When they came together, it was throat to throat——two beasts now, instead of one, for Pierrot had in him the fury and strength of the wolf, the cat, and the panther.

McTaggart was the bigger and heavier man, a giant in strength; yet in the face of Pierrot's fury he lurched back over the table and went down with a crash. Many times in his life he had fought, but he had never felt a grip at his throat like the grip of Pierrot's hands. They almost crushed the life from him at once. His neck snapped—a little more, and it would have broken. He struck out blindly from his back, and twisted himself to throw off the weight of the halfbreed's body. But Pierrot was fastened there, as Sekoosew the ermine had fastened itself at the jugular of the partridge, and Mush McTaggart's jaws slowly swung open, and his face began to turn from red to purple.

Cold air rushing through the door, Pierrot's voice and the sound of battle roused Nepeese quickly to consciousness and the power to raise herself from the floor. She had fallen near Baree, and as she lifted her head, her eyes rested for a moment on the dog before they went to the fighting men. Baree was alive! His body was twitching; his eyes were open; he made an effort to raise his head as she was looking at him.

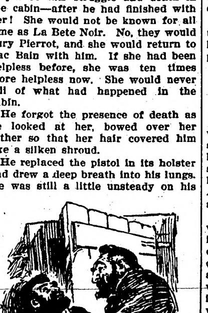
Then she dragged herself to her knees and turned to the men, and Pierrot, even in the blood-red fury of his desire to kill, must have heard the sharp cry of joy that came from her when she saw that it was the Factor from Lac Bain who was underneath. With a tremendous effort she staggered to her feet, and for a few moments she stood swaying unsteadily as her brain and her body readjusted themselves. Even as she looked down upon the blackening face from which Pierrot's fingers were choking the life, Bush McTaggart's hand was groping blindly for his pistol. He found it. Unseen by Pierrot, he dragged it from its holster. It was one of the black devils of chance that favored him again, for in his excitement he had not snapped the safety shut after shooting Baree. Now he had only strength left to pull the trigger. Twice his forefinger closed. Twice there came deadened explosion close to Pierrot's body.

In Pierrot's face Nepeese saw what had happened. Her heart died in her breast as she looked upon the swift and terrible change wrought by sudden death. Slowly Pierrot straightened. His eyes were wide for a moment—wide and staring. He made no sound. She could not see his lips move. And then he fell toward her, so that McTaggart's body was free. Blindly and with an agony that gave no evidence in cry or word she flung herself down beside him. He was dead.

How long Nepeese lay there, how long she waited for Pierrot to move, to open his eyes, to breathe, she would never know. In that time McTaggart rose to his feet and stood leaning against the wall, the pistol in his hand, his brain clearing itself as he saw his final triumph. His work did not frighten him. Even in that tragic moment as he stood against the wall, his defense—if it ever came to a defense—framed itself in his mind. Pierrot had murderously assaulted him—without cause. In self-defense he had killed him. Was he not the Factor of Lac Bain? Would not the Company and the law believe his word before that of this girl? His brain leaped with the old exultation. It would never come to that—to a betrayal of this struggle and death in the cabin—after he had finished with her! She would not be known for all time as La Bete Noir. No, they would bury Pierrot, and she would return to Lac Bain with him. If she had been helpless before, she was ten times more helpless now. She would never tell of what had happened in the cabin.

He forgot the presence of death as he looked at her, bowed over her father so that her hair covered him like a silken shroud.

He replaced the pistol in its holster and drew a deep breath into his lungs. He was still a little unsteady on his feet, but his face was again the face of a devil. He took a step, and it was then there came a sound to rouse the girl. In the shadow of the farther wall Bareo had struggled to his haunches, and now he growled.



His Neck Snapped—a Little More and It Would Have Broken.

Slowly Nepeese lifted her head. A power which she could not resist drew her eyes up until she was looking into the face of Bush McTaggart. She had almost lost consciousness of his presence; her senses were cold and deadened—it was as if her own heart had stopped beating along with Pierrot's. What she saw in the Factor's face dragged her out of the numbness of her grief back to the abyss of her own peril. He was standing over her. In his face there was no pity, nothing of horror at what he had done—only an insane exultation as he looked—not at Pierrot's dead body, but at her. He put out a hand, and it rested on her head. She felt his thick fingers crumpling her hair, and his eyes blazed like embers of fire behind watery films. She struggled to rise, but with his hands at her hair he held her down.

"Great God!" she breathed.

She uttered no other words, no plea for mercy, no other sound but a dry, hopeless sob. In that moment neither of them heard or saw Baree. Twice in crossing the cabin his hind-quarters had sagged to the floor. Now he was close to McTaggart. He wanted to give a single lunge to the man-brute's back and snap his thick neck as he would have broken a caribou-bone. But he had no strength. He was still partially paralyzed from his fore-shoulder back. But his jaws were like iron, and they closed savagely on McTaggart's leg.

With a yell of pain the Factor released his hold on the Willow, and she staggered to her feet. For a precious half-minute she was free, and as the Factor kicked and struck to loose Baree's hold, she ran to the cabin door and out into the day. The cold air struck her face; it filled her lungs with new strength; and without thought of where hope might lie she ran through the snow into the forest.

McTaggart appeared at the door just in time to see her disappear. His leg was torn where Baree had fastened his fangs, but he felt no pain as he ran in pursuit of the girl. She could not go far. An exultant cry, inhuman as the cry of a beast, came in a great breath from his gaping mouth as he saw that she was staggering weakly as she fled. He was halfway to the edge of the forest when Baree dragged himself over the threshold. His jaws were bleeding where McTaggart had kicked him again and again before his fangs gave way. Halfway between his ears was a seared spot, as if a red-hot poker had been laid there for an instant. This was where McTaggart's bullet had gone. A quarter of an inch deeper, and it would have meant death. As it was, it had been like the blow of a heavy club, paralyzing his senses and sending him limp and unconscious against the wall. He could move on his feet now without falling, and slowly he followed in the tracks of the man and the girl.

As she ran, Nepeese's mind became all at once clear and reasoning. She turned into the narrow trail over which McTaggart had followed her once before, but just before reaching the chasm, she swung sharply to the right. She could see McTaggart. He was not running fast, but was gaining steadily, as if enjoying the sight of her helplessness, as he had enjoyed it in another way on that other day. Two hundred yards below the deep pool into which she had pushed the Factor—just beyond the shallows out of which he had dragged himself to safety—was the beginning of Blue Feather's gorge. An appalling thing was shaping itself in her mind as she ran to it—a thing that with each gasping breath she drew became more and more a great and glorious hope. At last she reached it and looked down.

And as she looked, there whispered up out of her soul and trembled on her lips the swan-song of her mother's people.

> Our fathers—come!
> Come from out of the valley.
> Guide us—for today we die,
> And the winds whisper of death!

She raised her arms. Against the white wilderness beyond the chasm she stood tall and slim. Fifty yards behind her the Factor from Lac Bain stopped suddenly in his tracks. "Ah," he mumbled. "Is she not wonderful!" And behind McTaggart, coming faster and faster, was Baree.

Again the Willow looked down. She was at the edge, for she had no fear in this hour. Many times she had clung to Pierrot's hand as she looked over. Down there no one could fall and live. Fifty feet below her the water which never froze was smashing itself into froth among the rocks. It was deep and black and terrible, for between the narrow rock walls the sun did not reach it. The roar of it filled the Willow's ears.

She turned and faced McTaggart.

Even then he did not guess, but came toward her again, his arms stretched out ahead of him. Fifty yards! It was not much, and shortening swiftly.

Once more the Willow's lips moved. After all, it is the mother soul that gives us faith to meet eternity—and it was to the spirit of her mother that the Willow called in the hour of death. With the call on her lips she plunged into the abyss, her wind-whipped hair clinging to her in a glistening shroud.

Chapter XII

A moment later the Factor from Lac Bain stood at the edge of the chasm. His voice had called out in a hoarse bellow—a wild cry of disbelief and horror that had formed the Willow's name as she disappeared. He looked down, clutching his huge red hands and staring in ghastly suspense at the boiling water and black rocks far below. There was nothing there now—no sign of her, no last flash of her pale face and streaming hair in the white foam. And she had done that—to save herself from him!

The soul of the man-beast turned sick within him, so sick that he staggered back, his vision blinded and his legs tottering under him. He had killed Pierrot, and it had been a triumph; all his life he had played the part of the brute with a stoicism and cruelty that had known no shock—nothing like that overwhelmed him now, numbing him to the marrow of his bones until he stood like one paralyzed. He did not see Baree. He did not hear the dog's whining cries at the edge of the chasm. For a few moments the world turned black for him; and then, dragging himself out of his stupor, he ran frantically along the edge of the gorge, looking down wherever his eyes could reach the water, striving for a glimpse of her. At last it grew too deep. There was no hope. She was gone—and she had faced that to escape him!

An Intelligent Interest

The rector of a country parish was showing one of his parishioners round his garden. He paused in front of the garden wall, into which had been built a huge bowlder of granite, differing obviously from the red sandstone blocks that composed the rest of the wall. "That," he said, indicating the granite bowlder, "came down in a glacier." The visitor considered the object with much attention and then said thoughtfully: "Would that be before the war?"—Manchester Guardian

Had Wrong Idea; Life Was Ruined

War Wall Inventor Tasted Height of Success and Depth of Failure.

Toronto, Ont.—In an obscure backwoods village north of here there died the other day a man, who, within the short space of a few months, traveled the long road from the height of success to the depth of condemnation—all because an idea went wrong.

The man was Murray Compton, farmer and inventor, who had his one big chance while a captain of infantry in the Canadian expedition force, and went to a premature grave with the curses of hundreds of dying Canadian soldiers ringing in his ears.

For Murray Compton was the originator of "China Wall," that stupendous blunder which was designed to save the lives of soldiers but which became a trap in which many hundreds were killed.

Compton's battalion was doing duty in the Ypres sector in the spring of 1916. From the ramparts, in Ypres city, to the front line the soldiers were exposed to a withering shell and machine-gun fire while going to and from the line. The distance was somewhat more than a mile, but ration and working parties, as well as battalions going into or coming out of the line, suffered terribly. The troops had the choice of two routes; the one up Menin road, which was a veritable deathtrap, and the other through Zillebek village. Most of them chose the latter route, for it accorded slight protection.

Chinese Wall Recalled.

While leading his company in and out of the line Compton became horrified at the number of casualties and his inventive brain sought some method of reducing the loss of life. Suddenly he was confronted with a mental picture of the great wall of China, which for centuries had kept out enemies of the yellow men.

Compton was practical enough to realize that time prevented the erection of a wall which would correspond with the original.

He submitted his rough idea to his colonel, who approved it and sent it to brigade headquarters. From there it went to division and then corps headquarters. Here it was turned over to the commanding officer of the engineers, whose approval hastened construction.

Night after night, for many weeks, weary working parties filled sandbags which were pounded into the form of huge bricks and laid end to end to form a great wall. Weeks of ceaseless activity saw the task completed without interruption from the enemy.

Casualties Much Reduced.

The wall stood for weeks, the admiration of every soldier who found protection behind its friendly shadow. Casualties were reduced to a minimum and Compton was showered with honors. He was mentioned in dispatches and decorated with the military cross.

Come the 2nd of June, that fateful day when the German high command concentrated everything on a terrific drive, which was calculated to drive a wedge in the British lines and open up a route to the channel ports.

The bombardment was the worst experienced by any troops up to that period. Trenches were obliterated, men killed by hundreds, while wave after wave of German infantry was thrown into the attack in an endeavor to break the Canadian line. Telegraph communication with the rear was impossible and several runners were killed before word could be relayed back to Ypres to "send re-enforcements."

Germans Bombard Wall.

Battalion after battalion was hurried up from rest camps in motor lorries, dumped off in Ypres and then started up the line. As soon as German observation balloons and planes observed troops being concentrated in the rear, they signaled the German artillery and the barrage was turned on the China wall.

Thousands of men had congregated behind this wall, awaiting darkness before being thrown into the breach. In five minutes the bombardment reduced the wall to a mass of twisted and torn sandbags, and practically every man behind it had been killed or wounded.

In spite of this great disaster the front-line troops held on grimly. For two days and nights they withstood the incomparable inferno before fresh troops relieved them. But the way to the sea had been blocked.

Ironically, Compton was commanding a company of reserves which had taken refuge behind his creation when the German bombardment began. By another strange twist of fate he was one of the few men who were permitted to escape being killed or wounded.

Escapes Without Wounds.

A merciful command relieved Compton of his duties and his name was posted on the casualty list as "wounded." Some of his own men who saw him going out of the line for the last time said he did not show a scratch. But his nerve was broken and his great plan had crashed.

He was mustered out of the army and sent back to Canada. He went back to his farm, but his neighbors saw a mighty change. His eyes were wild and vacant and he kept mumbling to himself.

They didn't know the reason till he died.

FIND KOOTENAY COUNTRY NOW HUNTERS' PARADISE

Big Game Now in Great Abundance as Result of Protective Laws of British Columbia.

Vancouver, B. C.—As a result of a careful watch kept by game wardens for several years, one of the richest big-game districts on the continent is coming back to its own. This is the great range of valley foothills and mountains at the headwaters of the Kootenay river, a half-day's journey from the main line of the railway.

From a spot on the river not far from the Banff-Windermere highway herds of elk, moose, deer, caribou, mountain sheep, goats and numbers of black, brown, grizzly and cinnamon bears and mountain lions can be seen within a radius of six or eight miles.

In the old days, this territory was a battleground of the Indian tribes, owing to the vast herds of wild animals to be found there. When hunting was poor on the prairie side of the mountains, or in the valleys farther west, the tribes in the districts affected headed for the headwaters of the Kootenay, where game was sure to be found. Naturally, the Indians of the upper Kootenay objected and famous skirmishes often ensued. Blackfeet, Bloods, Spokanes, Flatheads, Siwashes, Creeks and Stoneys all raided into the country at times.

When the Indians left off the wild life the raids ceased, but the Indians of the district slaughtered freely and greatly reduced the game until the provincial game wardens went in and taught them fear of the law. Now the game is multiplying to an extent that is astonishing even to the old settlers. This is especially true in regard to elk and caribou.

It was in this country that the famous "blue" moose, purchased before the war by Emperor William of Germany, and now in a museum in Germany, was killed.

ATTRACTIVE WOMEN

If You Would Be Attractive You Must Be Healthy

A beautiful woman is always admired. There are many types of beauty. But no woman can be truly beautiful unless she is healthy. Radiant vitality is always attractive however plain a woman's features may be.

Many a woman has found her health improved thru the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Weakness, loss of weight, and a pale complexion were a few of the things of which Mrs. J. C. Taylor of Box 211, Tallahassee, Florida, complained before she started taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. "I could not even sit down and talk to a friend for any length of time," she states, "I would forget what I was talking about and felt so blue." Mrs. Taylor is so pleased with the work of the Vegetable Compound that she keeps a bottle of it in the house at all times—and when it is empty, her husband makes sure that she has a new bottle. "I have regained my strength," Mrs. Taylor writes. "I can do all my housework now and I feel just fine."

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is made from roots and herbs and has been growing in popularity among women for over fifty years.

KIEL NOW DESERTED; POMP ONCE REIGNED

Defeat Most Clearly Shown in Once-Famed Port.

Kiel, Germany.—Nowhere would the kaiser, were he to return to his country, find a more poignant contrast between the present and the past than in Kiel.

William II was the creator of this powerful naval fastness, with its huge docks and all the apparatus of shipbuilding and repair. He was the builder of the formidable fortifications defending the sea approaches. This was the scene of some of his great moments when as commander in chief of the fleet, he steamed into the harbor as rounds of applause poured from dozens of guns.

All Is Deserted.

Today the harbor looks empty. The forts are partly dismantled. The naval academy is closed. The castle in which Prince Henry, the kaiser's brother, lived is an office building. The yacht clubhouse, presented by the elder Krupp, is now a scientific institute. It was there the kaiser, surrounded by his admirals and generals, made many an utterance that caused flutters in foreign chancelleries. Everywhere are suggestions of decay and neglect and change.

The kaiser has not been here since that afternoon of June 28, 1914, when he was occupied with arrangements respecting the regatta. An aid delivered a dispatch, saying that Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife had been assassinated at Sarajevo.

"Now, I must do everything over again," were the emperor's first words. Flags were ordered half-mast. He terminated the regatta, sent messages to Winston Churchill, who was on an English boat in the harbor, to the prince of Monaco on his yacht and to others invited to dinner that evening, composed a telegram to Franz Joseph, and took a special train for Berlin.

Prince Henry comes to Kiel occasionally but not often since he left it in a closed automobile flying a red flag when the revolution broke here in the early days of November, 1918. This manner of leaving is the subject of adverse gossip among the townspeople. They say also that his democratic manner which made him a popular personage has changed; that he is now distant, brusque, somewhat bitter in speech. The prince lives on his estate, Hemmelsmark, near Eckenfoerde, not far from Kiel. The sailor-prince has become greatly interested in his farming and stock raising and shows his visitors fine cattle with as much pleasure as he formerly took in the equipment of his flagship.

Flag Hauled Down.

The war appears to have placed the United States rather outside the prince's sympathies. An American yachtsman living in Hamburg, who is a member of the Hansa Yacht club, after the treaty of peace was signed, flew the American flag above the Hansa pennant, having first obtained a letter of assent from the club's secretary. Prince Henry was displeased and some of the club members questioned the propriety. The American explained that although the club authorities had approved of the American flag, he would remove the Hansa pennant and hoist that of the Royal Danish club, of which he also was a member. That he did.

Representatives of American automobile companies, members of the Hamburg Automobile club, were a little annoyed over the prince's insistence in his speech at the opening of the new clubhouse, that good Germans should not buy foreign cars; that the money went out of the country and that German cars were all right.

The prince at one time drove an American car.

However, the prince is described as having the most agreeable recollections of his American experiences, of his cordial receptions, and of the successful political effect, as he believed, of his mission.

Ship's Doctor at Sea Aids Injured Priest Ashore

Montreal.—The increasing uses of radio were clearly demonstrated recently, when the C. G. M. M. steamer Canadian Forester, by a constant interchange of messages between the ship's doctor and a shore station, was able to render valuable medical assistance to the parish priest of Clarencetown, Long Island, Bahamas.

According to the story, as relayed to the Canadian Marconi station here, the Canadian Forester while at sea received an urgent call from station GOM for the service of a doctor. There was no doctor on the island, the message said, and the parish priest had fallen from a horse and injured his leg.

The steamer carried a doctor, but it was unable to get to the island, so the wireless operator was directed to ask the shore station for further particulars about the priest's injuries and to stand by for instructions. A message soon came back to the ship that the parishioners were standing by to render what aid they could. The ship's doctor, standing beside the wireless operator, then gave the shore listeners definite instructions as to how to proceed.

A week later, as the Canadian Forester was homeward bound, the doctor received a wireless message from the Bahamas informing him that the wireless prescriptions had been followed to the letter and that the patient was making satisfactory progress.

PANAMA CANAL IS NOW MAKING GOOD

"Big Ditch" Earns $15,000,000 for Government.

Washington.—With another good year's record in sight, the Panama canal has apparently reached a basis that will yield the United States government $15,000,000 or more each year. The steady growth of the "big ditch" joining the Atlantic and the Pacific leads government officials to predict that it not only will pay for itself but also prove one of the best investments of the government.

With receipts for the fiscal year exceeding $19,000,000, the canal has two months to go to pass the 1925 tolls of $19,021,419.77. The Panama railroad, power plant, and other business adjuncts also are showing handsome profits.

The canal, following a period of uncertainty after its completion in 1914, now is earning money at the rate of 6 per cent on the investment. Most of the funds with which the canal was built were derived from government loans bearing 2 or 3 per cent interest.

The net cost of the canal and its adjuncts is figured at $266,000,000, and net earnings for the last two years have exceeded $15,000,000. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, net revenues were more than $17,000,000.

The business of the canal has increased six-fold since the first fiscal year, which ended June 30, 1915, the net tonnage increasing from 3,792,572 to 22,855,151 tons.

American shipping has gradually taken first place in use of the canal. During the first year American and British tonnages were almost the same. At present American tonnage is more than double the British.

Tonnage of commercial vessels of the largest users of the canal during the last fiscal year were: United States, 12,271,487; England, 5,949,391; Japan, 823,809; Norway, 672,663; Germany, 723,067.

Gorillas Seize African Women; Troops on Trail

Madrid.—A Spanish military expedition under the leadership of General Munez de Prado, tracing the frontiers of Spanish Guinea in Africa, reports that large bands of enormous gorillas are terrorizing the natives.

Above the cataracts of the Benito river near Otocho, the gorillas have raided the villages and have captured native women, whom they are keeping prisoners in the dense jungles around the town.

Nightly the women's screams are heard by the villagers, who are afraid to seek to rescue them.

The general announces he is preparing an elaborate military expedition to rescue the women and to kill or to capture the gorillas who also are devastating the plantations.

The Spanish government has instructed the leader to capture the gorillas alive wherever possible for research on the Voronoff gland experiments.

Breaks Precedent

Boston.—The Hub has broken another precedent. For the first time in its history, a woman, Miss Myrtle C. Dickson, has been appointed principal of a high school.

Russian Women's Feet Lost in American Shoes

Moscow, Russia.—Twenty-five thousand pairs of American women's shoes recently shipped into Russia have proved unsalable because of their large size. Next to the Japanese and Chinese, the Russian women have the smallest feet in the world. The 25,000 pairs of discarded shoes will be shipped into Finland, where the women are said to have considerably larger feet than their Russian cousins.

AMERICAN TO STUDY RICHEST OF MINES

Mexican Wealth Producer Over 400 Years Old.

Washington.—The mines which gave their wealth of gold and silver to the Toltecs of Mexico when the Spanish conquistadores discovered them 400 years ago, and which have produced unceasingly since, will be included in a mineralogical survey on which a Smithsonian geologist left Washington recently.

Dr. W. F. Foshag, assistant curator of mineralogy and petrology in the National museum under the Smithsonian, will make the survey under the auspices of the institution and of the mineralogical department of Harvard university. He will go to Chihuahua, Durango and Coahuila and other important mining regions of northern Mexico, as time permits. In spite of the great age of and great wealth produced by Mexico's mines, no one has ever described the mineralogy or geology of the region. Even collections are rare. Doctor Foshag will help to remedy this lack.

Richest in World.

The richest silver mines in the world are at Guanajuato, 12 hours by rail from Mexico City. In historical times it has produced nearly a billion dollars' worth of metal. The Comstock lode in Nevada, which was the richest deposit in the United States, produced $340,000,000 in the 30 years of operation.

The great main shaft upon the Veta Madre vein at Guanajuato is one of the mining wonders of the world. It is 30 feet in diameter and 1,700 feet deep. To the depth of 300 feet it is lined with masonry, but for the remainder of the distance the rocks are firm and do not require timbering or masonry. The reason for the great width is to permit eight or more windlasses to be worked at once.

Until comparatively recent years these great mines had no machinery. Even the water was baled out of the shafts in cattle skins to be dumped. Production has therefore been slow, which accounts for the long centuries of operation.

Discovered by Convicts.

Two escaped convicts discovered the Santa Eulalia mines in the mountains south of Chihuahua, where Doctor Foshag will go first, in 1703. Not daring to return to civilization, they sent Indian carriers to a priest with the request that he intercede with the government in their behalf. They promised that if allowed to go unmolested they would build the "finest cathedral in the western hemisphere." The bargain was struck and Chihuahua cathedral is the result—admittedly one of the finest specimens of Spanish-American architecture in existence.

Doctor Foshag has an invitation from the governor of Durango to make his survey of that state and has been promised aid in getting collections and information. He will inspect particularly the large gold, silver, copper and iron mines, and possibly the opal and tin mines, studying modes of occurrence of the ores, minerals in the ores, and, if possible, how they were formed.

Offers Timely Safety Hints for Swimmers

Chicago.—Some timely safety suggestions for swimmers are contained in a bulletin issued by the National Safety council, which says:

Don't swim if you have heart trouble.

It is advisable never to go in swimming alone.

If you are tired or overheated don't go in the water.

Wait at least two hours after eating before going swimming.

Dive only where you have accurate knowledge of the depth of the water.

Swimmers should not become exhausted. If you have overestimated your strength, rest on your back until you feel strong enough to swim ashore.

Do not struggle if caught in a swift current or undertow. The force of the current will bring you to the surface and then you can work in toward shore.

Be sure to learn the prone pressure method of resuscitation. Be capable of applying first aid methods to people who have been apparently drowned.

Gwinnette Signature Sells for $19,000

New York.—A promissory note signed by Button Gwinnett, signer of the Declaration of Independence from Georgia, was sold for $19,000 and a cut signature of the same patriot, detached from a memorial in support of a colonial political candidate, brought $10,500 at the Anderson galleries.

The two specimens were part of the historical library of Dr. George C. F. Williams of Hartford.

Dr. A. S. Rosenbach purchased the document, bearing one of the finest examples of the signature. The price was $3,500 less than the same buyer paid last January for the Gwinnett signature from the Col. James H. Manning collection. The present clear and forceful signature was appended to a note for 14,365 pounds made out by Gwinnett to John Neufville, of "Charles Town," S. C.

Expensive Eggs

The poultry business is still in its infancy. A condor, now in the National Zoological park in Washington, has just laid an egg that is valued at $750. Why bother with Rhode Island Reds or White Wyandottes? A pen of condors is the thing. To be sure, they lay but seldom—this one only five times in twenty years—but at market rates for the eggs they don't need to lay often. A romantic bird! Its wing spread of nine feet is one of the largest, if not the largest, in the whole avian world; and in the great quills of the primaries the '49ers kept their gold dust. Was that the way "clear quill" got its meaning of pure, unadulterated?—Youth's Companion.

Early Colonial Clocks

Although clocks had been made for centuries they were still a luxury at the time of the Colonies. The early settlers contented themselves with a glance at the sun which began and ended their day. The clocks they had were set upon a shelf against the wall and the long pendulum swung back and forth in a slit in the shelf. These were called "Wag-at-the-wall" clocks. It was probably to protect the pendulum that the first tall clock cases were made, says Sarah M. Lockwood in "Antiques."

CHANGE THE LIGHTS AND YOU CHANGE THE CITY

Experts in city planning have discovered an interesting fact—you can change the whole section of a city just by changing the street lighting.

For example: Put modern lights along a gloomy business street and it becomes an important business street.

Lay a ribbon of light along a dark thoroughfare and you transform it into a main traffic artery.

Give a residence district the right kind of lights and it blossoms with the right kind of homes.

No other public improvements costs so little as good street lighting and no other improvement is so decidedly an investment. Property values rise when streets are well lighted; crime diminishes and the good name of the city is spread abroad.

"This is a very good showing when you consider that 103 patrons out of 185 delivered more than 100 pounds of butterfat," "Butter-Pete" says, in his monthly report. "The patron that tops the list, Arno Steinhauer, must be given credit for making rapid progress as a dairyman. Just the other day he purchased a full-blooded Holstein heifer from Mr. Wilson of Thief River Falls, which proves that he is satisfied in his own mind that it pays to milk cows, and that it pays better to milk good cows.

"In this connection I want to say that I shall be glad to test your cows for you. Testing is very important as well as helpful to some extent, even tho you do not weigh the milk once a month which, of course, is the correct way. Before bringing in your samples please see me and find out on which day I can do your testing."

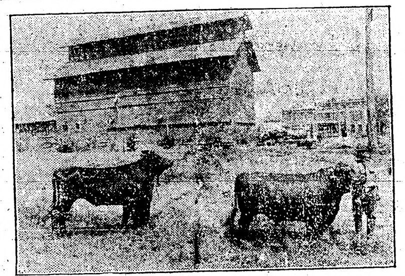
Better Beef Special "Shows Up" Inferior Cattle on Education Tour



St. Paul, Minn.—The Better Beef Special train established a new, educational touring record in North Dakota and Minnesota when it closed its 5 weeks travel, E. C. Leedy, General Agricultural Supervisor of the Great Northern Railway announced. It covered a distance of 4,265 miles making 48 stops in North Dakota and 26 in Minnesota. Ten days of the 5 weeks were spent on the Great Northern line, during which exhibits were shown and demonstrations made at 26 stations in North Dakota and western Minnesota. Nearly 30,000 people were present at these demonstrations, calculated to show the farmers how to produce beef that will bring the highest price and most profit.

Most communities took an active part in advertising the tour and promoting the interest of farmers in the program. Special articles were carried in the local papers in advance. Many places made a real holiday with a special program of games, races, music and contests of various kinds, to fill out the day. From one to five purebred calves were given away by the business community on guessing contests, usually guessing on the weight of one or more animals on the special train.

Speakers emphasized that dairy cattle have been bred for generations to develop the faculty of converting the feed they eat into milk. This has developed animals which when fed to fatten do not put their flesh over the back, loin and hind quarters where the high priced cuts of meat are to be found. It is therefore necessary for a dairyman when his cows have served their usefulness on the farm to sell them at a low price. At present market prices are from 3c to 4c per pound. About one fourth of the meat consumed in the United States comes from animals of this character.

If a farmer is using cows for milking in which there is a good deal of the beef type breed he can, when ready to sell, feed them a few months and put additional weight on the back and hind quarters and raise them from the 3c and 4c class to the 5c, 6c and even 7c class. Butchers and packer-buyers discriminate between the dairy type and beef type cows even of the same weight because they know the dairy type will not produce when slaughtered the meat value that the beef type does.

They showed by the use of six steers one representing each grade, prime, choice, good, medium, common, and inferior, the effect of breeding and feeding in producing beef of quality. It was made plain that a feeder cannot make high quality beef in inferior bred steers no matter how well he is fed. The best finished inferior steer would not command more than medium price.

One expert said: "It costs the same rate of freight per hundred pounds to ship the scrub steer as it does the good steer. The scrub steer would bring $50 for 1000 pounds and the other $100 for 1000 pounds. It therefore costs the farmer twice as much freight for the scrub steer. It took him twice as long to grow him. This is one way the farmer can reduce his freight rates."

NOTICE TO FARMERS IN AGDAR TOWNSHIP

You are hereby notified to cut all noxious weeds along the main roads joining your farm. If you want to cut more weeds along the main roads than just what is on your side you will be paid at the rate of 35c per mile for this work.

Give this your prompt attention and have your weeds cut by the 24th day of July.

He mumbled that fact over and over again, stupidly, thickly, as though his brain could grasp nothing beyond it. She was dead. And Pierrot was dead. And he, in a few minutes, had accomplished it all.

He turned back toward the cabin—not by the trail over which he had pursued Nepeese, but straight through the thick bush. Great flakes of snow had begun to fall. He looked at the sky, where banks of dark clouds were rolling up from the south and east. The sun went out. Soon there would be a storm—a heavy snowstorm. The big flakes falling on his naked hands and face set his mind to work. It was lucky for him, this storm. It would cover everything—the fresh trails, even the grave he would dig for Pierrot.

It does not take such a man as the Factor long to recover from a moral concussion. By the time he came in sight of the cabin his mind was again at work on physical things—on the necessities of the situation. The appalling thing, after all, was not that both Pierrot and Nepeese were dead, but that his dream was shattered. It was not that Nepeese was dead, but that he had lost her. This was his vital disappointment. The other thing—his crime—it was easy to cover.

It was not sentiment that made him dig Pierrot's grave close to the princess mother's under the tall spruce. It was not sentiment that made him dig the grave at all, but caution. He buried Pierrot decently. Then he poured Pierrot's stock of kerosene where it would be most effective and touched a match to it. He stood in the edge of the forest until the cabin was a mass of flames. The snow was falling thickly. The freshly made grave was a white mound, and the trails were filling. For the physical things he had done there was no fear in Bush McTaggart's heart as he turned back toward Lac Bain. No one would ever look into the grave of Pierrot du Quesne. And there was no one to betray him if such a miracle happened. But of one thing his black soul would never be able to free itself. Always he would see the pale, triumphant face of the Willow as she stood facing him in that moment of her glory when, even as she was choosing death rather than him, he had cried to himself: "Ah! Is she not wonderful!"

As Bush McTaggart had forgotten Baree, so Baree had forgotten the Factor from Lac Bain. When McTaggart had run along the edge of the chasm, Baree had squatted himself in the foot-beaten plot of snow where Nepeese had last stood, his body stiffened and his forefeet braced as he looked down. He had seen her take the leap. Many times that summer he had followed her in her daring dives into the deep, quiet water of the pool. But this was a tremendous distance. She had never dived into a place like that.

He could see the black heads of the rocks, appearing and disappearing in the whirling foam like the heads of monsters at play; the roar of the water filled him with dread; his eyes caught the swift rush of crumbled ice between the rock walls. And she had gone down there!

He had a great desire to follow her, to jump in, as he had always jumped in after her. She was surely down there, even though he could not see her. Probably she was playing among the rocks and hiding herself in the white froth and wondering why he didn't come. But he hesitated—hesitated with his head and neck over the abyss, and his forefeet giving way a little in the snow. With an effort he dragged himself back and whined. He barked—the short, sharp signal with which he always called her. There was no answer. Again and again he barked, and always there was nothing but the roar of the water that came back to him.

The snow was falling now, and McTaggart had returned to the cabin. After a little Baree followed in the trail he had made along the edge of the chasm, and wherever McTaggart had stopped to peer over, Baree paused also. For a space his hatred of the man was burned up in his desire to join the Willow, and he continued along the gorge until, a quarter of a mile beyond where the Factor had last looked into it, he came to the narrow trail down which he and Nepeese had many times adventured in quest of rock-violets. The twisting path that led down the face of the cliff was filled with snow now, but Baree cleared his way through it until at last he stood at the edge of the unfrozen torrent. Nepeese was not here. He whined, and barked again, but this time there was in his signal to her an uneasy repression, a whimpering note which told that he did not expect a reply. For five minutes after that he sat on his haunches in the snow, stolid as a rock. What it was that came down out of the dark mystery and tumult of the chasm to him, what spirit-whispers of nature that told him the truth, it is beyond the power of reason to explain. But he listened, and he looked; and his muscles twitched as the truth grew in him; and at last he raised his head slowly until his black muzzle pointed to the white storm in the sky, and out of his throat there went forth the quavering, long-drawn howl of the husky who mourns outside the tepee of a master who is newly dead.

On the trail, heading for Lac Bain, Bush McTaggart heard that cry and shivered.

It was the smell of smoke, thickening in the air until it stung his nostrils, that drew Baree at last away from the chasm and back to the cabin. There was not much left when he came to the clearing. Where the cabin had been was a red-hot, smoldering mass. For a long time he sat watching it, still waiting and still listening. He no longer felt the effect of the bullet that had stunned him, but his senses were undergoing another change now, as strange and unreal as their struggle against that darkness of near-death in the cabin. In a space that had not covered more than an hour the world had twisted itself grotesquely for Baree. That long ago the Willow was sitting before her little mirror in the cabin, talking to him and laughing in her happiness, while he lay in vast contentment on the floor. And now there was no cabin, no Nepeese, no Pierrot. He did not go nearer to the smoldering mass of the cabin, but slinking low, made his way about the circle of the open to the dog-corral. This took him under the tall spruce. For a full minute he paused here, sniffing at the freshly made mound under its white mantle of snow. When he went on, he slunk still lower, and his ears were flat against his head.

The dog-corral was open and empty. McTaggart had seen to that. Again Baree squatted back on his haunches and sent forth the death-howl. This time it was for Pierrot. In it there was a different note from that of the howl he had sent forth from the chasm: it was positive, certain. In the chasm his cry had been tempered with doubt—a questioning hope, something that was so almost human that McTaggart had shivered on the trail. But Baree knew what lay in that freshly dug snow-covered grave. A scant three feet of earth could not hide its secret from him. There was death—definite and unequivocal. But for Nepeese he was still hoping and seeking.

She Was Not at the Tepee.

Until noon he did not go far from the cabin, but only once did he actually approach and sniff about the black pile of steaming timbers. Again and again he circled the edge of the clearing, keeping just within the bush and timber, sniffing the air and listening. Twice he went back to the chasm. Late in the afternoon there came to him a sudden impulse that carried him swiftly through the forest. He did not run openly now; caution, suspicion and fear had roused in him afresh the instincts of the wolf. With his ears flattened against the side of his head, his tail drooping until the tip of it dragged the snow and his back sagging in the curious, evasive gait of the wolf, he scarcely made himself distinguishable from the shadows of the spruce and balsams.

There was no faltering in the trail Baree made; it was straight as a rope might have been drawn through the forest, and it brought him, early in the dusk, to the open spot where Nepeese had fled with him that day she had pushed McTaggart over the edge of the precipice into the pool. In the place of the balsam shelter of that day there was now a water-tight birch-bark tepee which Pierrot had helped the Willow to make during the summer. Baree went straight to it and thrust in his head with a low and expectant whine.

There was no answer. It was dark and cold in the tepee. He could make out indistinctly the two blankets that were always in it, the row of big tin boxes in which Nepeese kept their stores, and the stove which Pierrot had improvised out of scraps of iron and heavy tin. But Nepeese was not there. And there was no sign of her outside. The snow was unbroken except by his own trail. It was dark when he returned to the burned cabin. All that night he hung about the deserted dog-corral, and all through the night the snow fell steadily, so that by dawn he sank into it to his shoulders when he moved out into the clearing.

With day the sky had cleared. The sun came up, and the world was almost too dazzling for the eyes. It warmed Baree's blood with new hope and expectation. His brain struggled even more eagerly than yesterday to comprehend. Surely the Willow would be returning soon! He would hear her voice. She would appear suddenly out of the forest. He would receive some signal from her. One of these things, or all of them, must happen. He stopped sharply in his tracks at every sound, and sniffed the air from every point of the wind. He was traveling ceaselessly.

His body made deep trails in the snow around and over the huge white mound where the cabin had stood; his tracks led from the corral to the tall spruce, and they were as numerous as the footprints of a wolf-pack for half a mile up and down the chasm.

On the afternoon of this day the second big impulse came to him. It was not reason, and neither was it instinct alone. It was the struggle halfway between, the brute mind fighting at its best with the mystery of an intangible thing—something that could not be seen by the eye or heard by the ear. Nepeese was not in the cabin, because there was no cabin. She was not at the tepee. He could find no trace of her in the chasm. She was not with Pierrot under the big spruce.

Therefore, unreasoning but sure, he began to follow the old trap-line into the north and west.

* * * * * * *

No man has ever looked clearly into the mystery of death as it is impinged upon the senses of the northern dog. It comes to him, sometimes, with the wind; most frequently it must come with the wind, and yet there are ten thousand masters in the northland who will swear that their dogs have given warning of death hours before it actually came; and there are many of these thousands who know from experience that their teams will stop a quarter of a mile from a stranger cabin in which there is unburied dead.

Yesterday Baree had smelled death, and he knew without process of reasoning that the dead was Pierrot. How he knew this, and why he accepted the fact as inevitable, is one of the mysteries which at times seems to give the direct challenge to those who concede nothing more than instinct to the brute mind. He knew that Pierrot was dead without exactly knowing what death was. But of one thing he was sure: he would never see Pierrot again; he would never hear his voice again; he would never hear again the swish-swish-swish of his snowshoes in the trail ahead, and so on the trap-line he did not look for Pierrot. Pierrot was gone forever. But Baree had not yet associated death with Nepeese. He believed that Nepeese was alive, and he was now just as sure that he would overtake her on the trap-line as he was positive yesterday that he would find her at the birch-bark tepee.

Since yesterday morning's breakfast with the Willow, Baree had gone without eating; to appease his hunger meant to hunt, and his mind was too filled with his quest of Nepeese for that. He would have gone hungry all that day, but in the third mile from the cabin he came to a trap in which there was a big snowshoe rabbit. The rabbit was still alive, and he killed it and ate his fill. Until dark he did not miss a trap. In one of them there was a lynx; in another a fisher-cat; out on the white surface of a lake he sniffed at a snowy mound under which lay the body of a red fox killed by one of Pierrot's poison baits. Both the lynx and the fisher-cat were alive, and the steel chains of their traps clanked sharply as they prepared to give Baree battle. But Baree was uninterested. He hurried on, his uneasiness growing as the day darkened and he found no sign of the Willow.

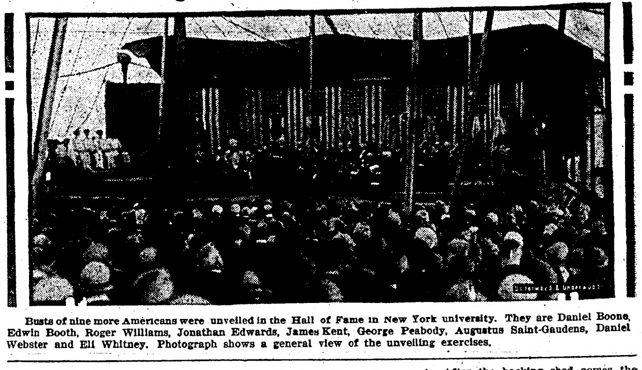
Odd Slavery Conditions

There is much corroborative testimony and numerous references to the facts that there were at the outbreak of the Civil war a very large number of free negroes and that these negroes in many cases owned property and slaves. These latter, however, were usually members of their families whom they had redeemed and whom they held as slaves technically on account of the laws of many states which prohibited the manumitted slaves from remaining in the state or territory. In many cases the slaveholder, while himself originally a slave, had received his freedom before certain laws went into effect which were not retroactive.

In 1913 California raised 7,800,000 bushels of potatoes.

Unveiling Nine Busts in the Hall of Fame



Busts of nine more Americans were unveiled in the Hall of Fame in New York university. Brickmakers Use Ancient Methods

Production of Today Varies Little From Practice of Chaldea.

New York.—The brick found in the homes of our best people in America is the handmade descendant of the bricks that were made in the days when the Five Nations still held undisputed sovereignty over the upper reaches of the Hudson, and when a few Dutch burgomasters placidly smoking their long-stemmed pipes on the waterfront of New Amsterdam were all that represented the new order of things coming in from old Europe. The new order arrived and brought with it conquest, colonization and later the industrial revolution. Machinery supplanted hands and electricity supplanted steam; but the aristocracy of the world of brick is still the "water-struck" handmade of the ancients.

Brick and the making of bricks has a history almost coeval with that of civilization. In 604 B. C. Nebuchadnezzar built Babylon of brick. Centuries before that remote day the Egyptians were shaping the mud of the Nile into handmade brick. Recently brick-veneered buildings were unearthed in central Chaldea that were erected about 4500 B. C. Two hundred years before the dawn of Christianity thousands of Chinese coolies were laboring on the wall around China. Twelve hundred and fifty miles long, it is still one of the outstanding examples of the historical use of brick.

From New York to Chaldea.

It is a far cry from the days when English was not understood on the streets of New York to the present when it is more often misunderstood; but it is an almost infinitely further cry to the days of Chaldea when the flat lands of Holland gave refuge to a few families of stone Nordics and Europe was a savage wilderness trembling on the verge of the Bronze age.

But since that day, when the crepuscular light of civilization was flaming feebly on the southern horizon of Europe, to this sophisticated day, when American and European civilization has superseded the artistic greatness of the vanished races, the lineage of handmade brick has come down through the ages unpolluted, for the handmade brick of 1926 A. D. is practically the same as the handmade brick of Chaldea, China and Cairo.

Brick-making by machinery has been elevated to a science; but brick-making by hand is even more than that, for it still retains its heritage of art, a heritage upon which all sciences are founded. There have been some advances made in the preparation of the material and the baking of the raw brick, but fundamentally the brickmaker of today does as did his forerunner of 6,000 years ago.

Use Surface Clay.

Surface clay is used. This is first plowed, then harrowed and broken into small bits to make easier its working, for in order to obtain the desired results the mud at molding time must be soft and pliable.

The molds before being filled are dipped into water. This allows the molded brick to slip out easily and prevents sticking. Molds treated in this manner are called "water struck," from which the name "water-struck" brick is derived. Molds ordinarily have a capacity for six bricks.

The molds are then carried to the sanded drying yard, a level space where the bricks are turned out of the molds and left to dry in the sunshine. The final drying takes place in the hacking shed where they are piled.

After the hacking shed comes the drying kiln, where the brick is baked. Baking the bricks is slow and tedious work and it is a work that requires skill almost amounting to intuition. The men who do this are few and in great demand. In the old days it was an art that was handed down from father to son and it is only through vast patience and unswerving application that a kiln man becomes a good baker.

The firing is done slowly and the heat is gradually increased until a temperature of 2,000 degrees is reached. This temperature must be uniform for from ten to fourteen days.

This method of making and burning brick differs very little from the practice of the early Pilgrims in their first brickyard. It varies but little more from the manner in which the first Chaldean made brick.

Chinese Pheasant Hen and Chicks Stop Traffic

Portland, Ore.—A Chinese pheasant hen, in to see the sights of the city, with her brood numbering no fewer than 13 fluffy chicks, recently held up traffic on a busy street intersection. There was no officer on the corner but the hen decided to cross anyway.

Some youth, who prefers to remain anonymous, sized up the situation and stationing himself in the center halted the traffic. Busy drivers entered into the spirit of the situation, left their machines and aided in rounding up the clucking hen and her 13 babies. The brood was turned over to the Oregon Humane society.

Finds Law Preventing Collision of Planets

Philadelphia.—Completing a quarter-century of astronomical research at the Philadelphia observatory, Prof. John A. Snyder declared that the laws and interior mechanism producing solar and stellar systems and surface eruptions have been discovered definitely.

Professor Snyder said he had concluded that the solar system and stellar systems in general were born according to regular laws. These laws, he said, seem to have for their purpose the perpetuation of the bodies they give off so that they cannot come in collision with one another or with other heavenly bodies.

He deduced from this the thought that there was a high plan in creation which safeguards any life that may appear upon the planets that revolve around the parent star.

CHIPPEWAS LAY CLAIM TO WATERFRONT OF DETROIT

Yellowed Treaties Form Basis of Demands to Be Presented to Court of Claims.

Clare, Mich.—Property demands which if granted would make every Chippewa Indian in Michigan as wealthy as Henry Ford were being formulated as 500 members of the Saginaw, Swan Creek and Black River bands of Chippewas met here in war council. The Court of Claims at Washington is to be the battleground and yellowed treaties will be weapons.

Once the owners of the northern half of the state, but today reduced to a few stump-covered acres, the Indians, led by Chief Elliot Collins of Clare, are arranging to ask for billions of dollars' worth of property due them, they say, under the terms of treaties signed during the early days of Michigan history.

The superlative demands the Indians are to make call upon the government to cede to them all the islands in Lakes Michigan, Superior, Ontario and St. Clair, 16 feet of land on each side of every creek in the state; 66 feet on the side of every river and 99 feet around every lake. The latter claim includes the whole Detroit waterfront, on which are located great industrial properties, including the Ford Motor company's River Rouge plant. Additional demands include the right to free trade with Canada and immunity from the restrictions of game laws.

Fanciful as the claims seem, the Indians regard them as guaranteed by half a dozen musty treaties long forgotten, they say, by the great White Father at Washington, but existing, nevertheless, in the archives of the Department of the Interior. Among these are the treaty of Fort Harmon, 1789; Jay's treaty, 1794; the treaty of Ghent, 1814; and the treaty of Detroit, signed in 1855.

Law Recognizes Poker

San Francisco.—Poker has a new legal backing. A judge recognized a game of poker through which Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Wright divided their property prior to their divorce. Mrs. Wright won the percolator and her wedding ring, while Wright raked in the family automobile.

Up-to-Date Indians

Tree Gives Milk

New Haven, Conn.—A "cow-tree" that gives milk was discovered by Prof. Samuel J. Record of the Yale school of forestry on his recent trip to British Honduras and Guatemala.

COULD NOT PUT ON HER SHOES

Mrs. Daugherty Was so Weak

In a little town of the middle West, was a discouraged woman. For four months she had been in such poor health that she could not stoop to put on her own shoes. Unable to do her work, unable to go out of doors or enjoy a friendly chat with her neighbors, life seemed dark indeed to Mrs. Daugherty.

Then one day, a booklet was left at her front door. Idly she turned the pages. Soon she was reading with quickened interest. The little booklet was filled with letters from women in conditions similar to hers who had found better health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I began taking the Vegetable Compound," Mrs. Daugherty writes, "and after I took the third bottle, I found relief. I am on my eleventh bottle and I don't have that trouble any more, and feel like a different woman. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to everyone I see who has trouble like mine, and you can use these facts as a testimonial. I am willing to answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. Ed. Daugherty, 1308 Orchard Ave., Muscatine, Iowa.

His Wedding Present

The late Maurice Francis Egan, diplomat and author, had no love for the pessimistic naturalistic type of fiction now so popular.

"This fiction," he once remarked at a luncheon in New York, "is as hard on modern morals as the old banker was.

"'Oh, papa,' the old banker's daughter cried, 'what a magnificent block of stock you are giving me for a wedding present!'

"'Yes,' growled the saturnine old banker. 'It will buy you your husband, your divorce and a gun, and after you kill him it will pay for your trial and acquittal.'"

"My wife got an awful shock when I ran for office," he remarked.

"Yes?" politely inquired his neighbor?

"Yes," he replied, "she found my political opponents could think up worse things to say about me than she could."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

EVERY ONE READS ON N. Y. SUBWAY

Stations and Trains Jammed in Rush Hours.

New York.—To ride on the subway between two persons, one reading a Yiddish newspaper and the other a Chinese journal, is nothing unusual to the New Yorker.

Yellow, white and black people, representatives of all nations, are the underground commuters. And all of them read. It may be a newspaper or tabloid of any language, or Shakespeare, Shaw or Cobb. But the confirmed subwayite always reads—unless he is too tightly jammed to raise his hands.

One ride would convince any critic that Father Knickerbocker's stenographers and salesgirls are either the best or worst read in the world.

Their subway literature ranges from "Sadie's Love Quest" and "Advice to the Lovelorn" to Barrie and Lewis. On one trip two adjoining girls were separately reading Hawthorne's "The Scarlet Letter" and Robert Ingersoll. Any number of modern and popular writers could find encouragement in the numbers reading their works.

Books mostly are in the hands of feminine readers. Men take the newspapers. Students, of whom there are great numbers, seem to like the trains as study halls. Probably there could be no greater test in concentration.

The "classes" ride in shifts. Laborers predominate around 5, 6 and 7 a. m. Then come clerks, stenographers and business men. Brokers and bankers are mostly in evidence between 8:30 and 10. After them come the housewives on shopping and visiting tours.

During the morning and evening rush hours the stations and trains are overrun by the thousands. Perhaps fifty get seats in a car and a hundred others try to grab as many straps. Those who fail do not need them—they hold up each other.

When toes are smashed and shins barked, quarrels or lectures on subway etiquette often result to the amusement of others. Sometimes a man's bunion is kicked as he heads for the doorway and he pauses to dare some one to step outside. The some one in question invites him to come back into the car.

But about that time the automatic door slams shut.

JAP RADIO EXPERT

The Japanese Edison is the name often given to Hiroshi Ando, twenty-four years old. He claims the successful invention of radio television, or the transmission of motion pictures by wireless. He also claims to have invented and patented in Japan the neutrodyne feature of radio one year before it was patented in the United States.

Weird Disease Makes Teeth Turn Purple

Washington.—A weird and rare disease that turns the teeth purple and makes sunlight on the skin unbearable was discussed by Prof. J. Barcroft, English physiologist, in a lecture before the Royal institution.

The affliction is so rare that there are only three known cases in England at the present time, but it is of especial interest to physiological and medical science because the purple substance, porphyrin, is closely allied to the red material, hemoglobin, that gives blood its color. Substracting its iron and albumen from hemoglobin by appropriate chemical means leaves porphyrin.

No one knows yet why the bodies of these unfortunate patients should be manufacturing the wrong pigment, Professor Barcroft said, but the fact remains that it is constantly being formed and deposited in their bones, teeth and skin.

$2.75 Deed to Land Nets Owner $1,600

Boston.—Sixteen years ago there was a man in Hyannis, Mass., who owed another man some money. It was only $2.75, but since he didn't have the cash, he gave his creditor a deed to some wild land he owned to square the account.

The new owner tucked the deed away among his papers and proceeded to forget all about it. Recently he ran across it and found he held title to some sixteen acres of land that is easily worth $100 an acre.

PAL OF JAMES BOYS A CHAMPION FIDDLER

Kinsman of Stonewall Jackson Recalls Early West.

Denton, Texas.—He used to shoot marbles and later Jayhawkers with the notorious James brothers, and now, going on ninety-three, he lays claim to the title of the oldest fiddler in the United States who is a Confederate veteran.

J. B. Jackson, Little Elm, Denton county, kinsman of Stonewall Jackson, Indian fighter, member of Quantrell's band in the Civil war, and collector of antique violins, has figured in the pioneer history of a dozen states.

For the last 30 years he has traveled by horse and buggy across Texas, and even into the mountains of New Mexico, selling shrubs and trees. This year is the first he has spent at home, and it is broken into by jaunts of many miles to play "Billy of the Low-Ground" and "Rose of Edinburgh" for the effete youth who gather round while he calls the figures of an old-fashioned square dance.

Chafes at Inactivity.

But he chafes at inaction. The wanderlust has enthralled him since his old raiding days with Quantrell's band, side by side with Frank and Jesse James. When the war was over he was one of the young men that went West in the wake of the gold rushing "forty-niners."

Boarding a clumsy river steamer, mounted with cannon fore and aft, he journeyed up the Missouri river. It was a perilous voyage, piercing the Indian country, and the crew and passengers, about forty in all, amused themselves by shooting buffalo, antelope, deer and mountain lions from the deck.

Jackson escaped the Indian arrows until he landed at Fort Benton, from which terminal he made a stagecoach trip of 250 miles to Helena. While in a South Dakota Indian fight he was wounded. He bears the scar, as well as marks of hand-to-hand conflict, a depression in his temple and a bent wrist.

He went through the Civil war unscathed.

After six years as metal expert in the Southern Pacific railroad shops at Sacramento, Calif., he returned to Texas.

Connoisseur of violins, Jackson has in his collection three valuable instruments, one said to be a Stradivarius; another, black with age, which bears the date of 1620, and his favorite, said to be 225 years old.

Jackson has been a fiddler from early childhood. His hands, slender and flexible, are as nimble as those of a flapper typist, although his back is bent nearly double.

North Texas has been Jackson's stamping ground since his return from California, about 1894, when he stopped at Forth Worth. He lived more than a year near Garland and later spent several years at Rockwall.

He was married at Knobnoster, Mo., 40 years ago, to Miss Rosa Keene. Three children are living—Mrs. R. B. Flowers, Little Elm, with whom he makes his home; Mrs. May Willoford, Dallas, and Ira B. Jackson, railway man, of Montana.

Defends James Boys.

Born at Burksville, Cumberland county, Kentucky, April 28, 1834, Jackson spent his youth in Clay county, Missouri. He recalls Kansas City when it was no more than a river boat terminal. It was in this vicinity that he was companion of the James boys, whose father was a Baptist minister, he recalls, "of a fine old Kentucky family."

"They weren't really bad; they were driven to what they did by cruel treatment during the war," the surviving playmate asserted.

"Eat sparingly" is the health formula of the nonogenarian, whose almost invariable menu is a biscuit with honey or molasses, a cup of coffee at breakfast and milk at other meals. He partakes of snuff and tobacco, the latter being smoked and chewed, but only occasionally.

Although both parents died in early maturity of tuberculosis, recent examination showed Jackson to be as sound as any person the physicians ever tested, they declared.

What Is It?

Seattle, Wash.—Alonzo Victor Lewis, sculptor, who has just completed a bust of Roald Amundsen, says the explorer's nose measures three inches long.

Pigeon Returns Dying as Hawks Raid Race

Worcester, Mass.—In a dying condition, with almost featherless wings and its body frightfully lacerated, Midland Hen, a prize-winning racing pigeon, owned by Stephen Raskett of this city, fluttered to its home coop after being six days on the 300-mile trip from Rochester, as a result of vicious attacks by hawks which are known to infest the Berkshire hills in large numbers.

The bird, with 175 others, was competing in the Commonwealth Racing Pigeon club's 300-mile contest. Less than one-half of these birds survived the trip. Midland Hen, though fatally wounded, took a little liquid food the other day.

GOLD RUSH CENTER ALMOST DESERTED

Scene of First Strike Now Ghostly Village.

Sacramento, Calif.—Hidden in the Eldorado country hills northeast of here lies the original boom town of the gold rush days—Coloma, on the site where James Marshall found the first flake of yellow metal that was the impetus for the greatest westward movement known to mining.

Once a city of 10,000 population, it has dwindled until the census taker must count carefully to register a total of 150.

In this village in which California's present-day prosperity was born there remain on its main street only a combination grocery store and lunch counter, a post office, an automobile service station, and here and there the shell of a fire-gutted building or the weed-grown foundations of business blocks.

When the gold fever was at its height, stores of all kinds lined the streets of Coloma—there were 14 hotels, the inevitable Well-Fargo express office and the usual saloons, gambling houses, a Chinese bank and even a sewing machine agent's office. There was a jail, an armory, four churches and three schools.

Fool's gold still glitters in the sand near the monument marking the site of Sutter's sawmill in the mill race of which Marshall made his discovery, but the yellow wealth of '48 went with the six-pony express lines that operated between Coloma and surrounding mines delivering mail for a dollar an ounce.

The old jail which housed killers and bad men in those days now is a stable. On a slope back of the town is the lonesome looking memorial statue of Marshall with bronze finger pointing to the spot where the gold rush began.

Once Inmate of Home, Gives Orphans Party

Kansas City, Mo.—Frank Payne knows the heart and mind of the kid of the orphan asylum for he was once one of them. So Mr. Payne gave a party.

It was no formal affair. Mr. Payne invited the 89 children of the Gillis home, an orphanage where he lived as a child, to his country estate.

When the 43 girls and 46 boys poured out of the busses the host presented the freedom of the Payne flower gardens, the pride of the district, the cherry orchard, with limbs bending under the loads of "sweethearts"; the 11-acre strawberry patch; boys, satiated with globules peeped from beneath green runners; the woods and the creek.

Boys went up cherry trees, girls ran for flowers; boys and girls went down on their knees in the strawberry patch; boys, saturated with cherries and strawberries, experimented with the red berries of the mulberry grove and found them green. Other boys tore for the woods and still others for the creek, shedding clothes as they went.

Many glorious hours later the kids left. The estate was like a cyclone-swept zone. But Mr. Payne was happy.

"If they had broken every tree down and had uprooted every strawberry plant," he said, "it would have been worth it to see the joy they had."

Noiseless Plane Secret Is Guarded by French

Paris.—French military aviation authorities are guarding with the closest secrecy the new invention of a silent airplane propeller enabling noiseless night bombing raids. If this proves successful, anti-aircraft artillery will be unable to find a target at the tremendous heights raiding machines fly, which is far above the reach of the most powerful searchlights.

Heretofore, anti-aircraft fire was directed by microphones detecting the sound of the propellers and actuating the range finders and directors.

The new air screw is metal made from a solid forging. Its silence is believed to be due to the absence of tip flukes and the keen leading edges of the propeller blades whose knife-like sharpness enables them to cut the air with the least possible disturbance. With the propeller's whir silenced, the manufacturers can muffle the motors.

Tongs Settle Disputes in Own Peace Temple

San Francisco.—The "Geneva" of the Chinese on the Pacific coast is in San Francisco's Chinatown, on the third floor of a dingy brick building. They refer to it as "Wo Ping Woey," which in English is "peace temple." Here the warring factions have their round table about which representatives of the so-called "high binder" tongs recently renewed their pledge of peace.

A few months back when reports of tong killings were coming in from other American cities, comparative quiet and order prevailed here. The lack of violence was probably due to two things—the peace temple and Sergt. John J. Manion, strapping police officer of the San Francisco department.

Promote Him

New York.—A patrolman attending an uptown theater dashed onto the stage when Jean Bodine slipped off a coat and poised to enter a bathtub. She was clad in tights, but he arrested her anyway.

Fly-Flit-Flop!

FLIES breed in filth, feed on filth and bring filth into your home.

Flit spray clears your home in a few minutes of disease-bearing flies and mosquitoes. It is clean, safe and easy to use.

Kills All Household Insects

Flit spray also destroys bed bugs, roaches and ants. It searches out the cracks and crevices where they hide and breed, and destroys insects and their eggs. Spray Flit on your garments. Flit kills moths and their larvae which eat holes. Extensive tests showed that Flit spray did not stain the most delicate fabrics.

Flit is the result of exhaustive research by expert entomologists and chemists. It is harmless to mankind. Flit has replaced the old methods because it kills all the insects—and does it quickly.

South Africa Reports Find of Red Diamond

The rare find of a red diamond of considerable value is reported from Kimberley, South Africa. It was found on the alluvial river diggings. This species of stone is very unusual and is likely to fetch from £120 to £150 ($600 to $750) a carat.

The cutting of the stone has been placed in the hands of a London firm, and although the accomplishment of this has proved of some difficulty the result will be that a flawless stone of about six carats will be produced.

The gem, at first glance, might be taken by the uninitiated to be a ruby of gigantic proportions, as it is an entirely red stone, without a blemish of any kind. Closer inspection, however, reveals that it possesses all the requisite properties of the true diamond, the grain being absolutely similar.

Good Use for Old Cars

Junked motor cars are being put to a new use at Pierre, S. D., that of helping to control the Missouri river. The Big Muddy has a habit of tearing away large parts of South Dakota farm land abutting the stream, during the spring rises, and carrying them downstream, sometimes in twenty-acre chunks. The piling of logs, brush and debris along the bank has not availed to stop the river's depredation, but it has been discovered that the frames of junked cars, piled one upon another wherever the water is cutting away the bank, settle so firmly and are so resistant to the channel stream that they stop the destruction. Several score of abandoned automobiles are serving more effectively than expensive piling.

Plague of Jellyfish

All is not roses and sweet-scented scenery in the neighborhood of the French Riviera. The little fishing village of Cros-de-Cagnes, just outside Nice, soon will be uninhabitable unless some means is found of destroying the millions of jellyfish which have appeared in the bay. Huge piles of dead fish are nightly thrown up on the beach and the authorities recently were unable to clean them away before they began to rot. Attempts to burn the fish had been unsuccessful.

The Biggest Little Paper In Marshall County

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, July 23, 1926. Volume 16; Number 12.

Beeves From U. Farm Top Carload Market

Fifty-three purebred Hereford calves, bred on the Schermerhorn farm in Mahnomen county and used by the animal husbandry division of the university in feeding experiments of 217 days' duration at University Farm, recently topped the season's carload morket price at South Saint Paul. Thirty-nine steer calves in the group averaging 943 pounds, scored at $10.25 per cwt., while 14 heifers included in the consignment brot $10 per cwt.

Baudette Cannery to Open

Jacob Phillips has purchased Elmer Moorhead's interest in the Baudette blueberry canning factory and will be associated with Charley Wubden in conducting the business. It is the intention of the new owners to put in new and modern machinery and to conduct the cannery to its full capacity this summer. Reports from the Lake of the Woods and other districts indicate an exceptional big crop of blueberries this year and it is expected that many carloads of the fruit will be shipped out. It is also the intention of Messers. Phillips and Wubbens to go into the canning of vegetables, although it may be too late to get the necessary machinery for this year. It will be good news to everybody in the district that the cannery is to open on a bigger scale than ever, and it ought to prove second only to the creamery in spreading money among the farmers.—Baudette Region.

At the opening ceremonies recently, 250,000 persons marched across the new Delaware River bridge. It is the largest suspension bridge in the world.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Phillipson of Duluth visited at the S. E. Reierson home last week.

A number of friends and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. Victor Johnson gave them a farewell party at the Mrs. K. Nyberg home at Thief River Falls Tuesday.

FARM SPARK PLUGS

Early fall plowing lightens the farm work. It is time to begin to think about it.

From a commercial standpoint the little animal, not highly finished, is in best demand.

Now is the time to get those animals ready for the show ring. This is a "tip" for the boys and girls in the calf and other livestock clubs.

Iris may be transplanted now. Part of the tops should be removed and the plants set firmly in the ground.

Hogs need pasture and shade in order to make good gains at this time of the year.

The south-bound local passenger now leaves half an hour earlier, due to a change of schedule.

Obert Reierson and family motored to Strathcona Sunday where they visited at the Henry Bjerk home.

H. O. Hanson and family, and Mrs. Ole Hanson, spent Monday afternoon visiting at the Mrs. K. Nyberg home in Thief River Falls.

MONTANA FARMERS HELP BUILD RAILWAY TO OPEN NEW EMPIRE TWICE SIZE OF RHODE ISLAND

Strip of Canadian Townships Lying Along the Border Also to Be Brought in Touch with the World by the Construction of 50 Miles of Railroad.

Scobey, Mont., July—Eight hundred farmers have chipped in $325,000 with the Great Northern Ry. to build 50 miles of railway extension and a new empire about twice the size of the state of Rhode Island is being opened in Montana. This line which will be extended west from Scobey, Mont., parelleling the Canadian boundary is to cost about $1,250,000. The farmers and a few business men purchased $325,000 of Great Northern treasury stock at par and the Hill line will furnish the balance of the money needed to build the line.

This is the first time in the history of the Northwest that farmers have assisted in financing an extension line. These farmers have been hauling their grain to market in wagons and motor trucks, some of them being obliged to travel 65 miles to sell their products. Five new towns will be established in this new domain and each of these towns will draw grain, live stock and other farm products from about 15 townships, representing areas that equal the size of the average Minnesota or Iowa counties. Twenty miles of this new railway will be completed this fall and the rest will be built next year. Considerable area in Canada also will be served by this railway extension. By next year when the road is completed, it is estimated an additional million and a half bushels of wheat will be marketed from this section. Most of the wheat raised in this upper region of Montana is eagerly sought by Eastern millers because of its unusually high protein content, and it is sold on the market at a premium of 15 cents or more per bushel above ordinary wheat.

The new empire which the extension of this line will open is one of the most dependable wheat regions on the North American continent under the summer fallow system of agriculture. There are about 2,000,000 virgin acres that will be cultivated to support this new railway extension. The townsites are to be put on sale in September and plans are under way to build the most modern towns architects can design. The new stock holders consist of about 95 per cent farmers and 5 per cent small town business men.

For years the farmers of Daniels and Valley counties lying next to the Canadian boundary have sought a branch line of the Great Northern Railway, but the war came on and the building of extension was of course out of the question. Then, when the railways finally were turned back to private control, the Great Northern Railway found itself with the rest of the lines of the United States, occupied entirely with rehabilitating its main line system. So these Montana farmers had to go on hauling their products to market by wagon and motor trucks. But these tillers of the soil kept persistently at it, maintaining a regular railway committee and importuning the Great Northern officials to build them a line. Finally the Great Northern announced that if the farmers of the two commodious Montana counties would absorb $250,000 worth of stock the line would be built. The farmers loosened their purse strings so quickly that they immediately oversubscribed this sum by $75,000 and they are jubilant because the line is going through what they regard as the best winter wheat belt in America.

By October it will be built to the coming town of Peerless, which by that time will be partly erected and there on the frontier waiting for the railway to come up to it. Next year the remaining 30 miles of rail will be laid to the terminal town of Opheim, which also will become a reality before the new railway catches up with it.

J. V. Bennett, of Scobey, diligent director of the frontier farmers' persistent petition for a railway, declares the most unusual feature of this stock sale to these farmers is the fact that they readily acquiesced to the regulations which made it mandatory for the Great Northern Railway to sell its treasury stock to them at par, $100 per share. These particular farmers are said to have more first hand knowledge of the railway situation than even a great many of big manufacturing shippers, 'hey have been studying it so long and faithfully. The fact that Great Northern stock could have been bought by them on Wall Street for $69.00 a share at the time, was only a passing incident to them for their committee's investigation of the railway conditions showed that this same stock has an asset valuation considerably over par and they declare their added production in the new region will make it still more valuable.

Farmers in other sections of Montana already are contemplating following this plan of aiding the railway in building branch lines tapping rich frontier sections of the state.

Army Cutworm Moths Are Invading Minnesota

Farmers and housewives in western Minnesota have complained this summer of a plague of moths, and have felt some alarm lest the appearance of the pest meant the breaking loose of some kind of crop or household pest.

It turns out now, according to W. C. Cook, one of the insect pest specialists of the Department of Agriculture of the University of Minnesota, that the moths are the adults of the western cutworm which sometimes does damage to wheat in Montana, Colorado, Nebraska, and other states. It is beleived to have made its way into Minnesota on the prevailing west winds.

It was a wonderfully clear night after the storm—cold and brilliant, with the shadows standing out as clearly as living things. The third idea came to Baree now. He was, like all animals, largely of one idea at a time—a creature with whom all lesser impulses were governed by a single leading impulse. And this impulse, in the glow of the starlit night, was to reach as quickly as possible the first of Pierrot's two cabins on the trap-line. There he would find Nepeese!

We won't call the process by which Baree came to this conclusion a process of reasoning; instinct or reasoning, whatever it was, a fixed and positive faith came to Baree just the same. He began to miss the traps in his haste to cover distance—to reach the cabin.

It was twenty-five miles from Pierrot's burned home to the first trap-cabin, and Baree had made ten of these by nightfall. The remaining fifteen were the most difficult. In the open spaces the snow was belly-deep and soft; frequently he plunged through drifts in which for a few moments he was buried.

Three times during the early part of the night Baree heard the savage dirge of the wolves. Once it was a wild paen of triumph as the hunters pulled down their kill less than half a mile away in the deep forest. But the voice no longer called to him. It was repellent—a voice of hatred and of treachery. Each time that he heard it he stopped in his tracks and snarled, while his spine stiffened.

At midnight Baree came to the tiny amphitheater in the forest where Pierrot had cut the logs for the first of his trap-line cabins. For at least a minute Baree stood at the edge of the clearing, his ears very alert, his eyes bright with hope and expectation, while he sniffed the air. There was no smoke, no sound, no light in the one window of the log shack. His disappointment fell on him even as he stood there; again he sensed the fact of his aloneness, of the barrenness of his quest. There was a disheartened slouch to his body as he made his way through the snow to the cabin door. He had traveled twenty-five miles, and he was tired.

The snow was drifted deep at the doorway, and here Baree sat down and whined. It was no longer the anxious, questing whine of a few hours ago. Now it voiced hopelessness and a deep despair. For half an hour he sat shivering with his back to the door and his face to the starlit wilderness, as if there still remained the fleeting hope that Nepeese might follow after him over the trail. Then he burrowed himself a hole deep in the snowdrift and passed the remainder of the night in uneasy slumber.

With the first light of day Baree resumed the trail. He was not so alert this morning. There was the disconsolate droop to his tail which the Indians call the Akoosewin—the sign of the sick dog. And Baree was sick—not of body but of soul. The keenness of his hope had died, and he no longer expected to find the Willow. The second cabin at the far end of the trap-line drew him on, but it inspired in him none of the enthusiasm with which he had hurried to the first. He traveled slowly and spasmodically, his suspicions of the forests again replacing the excitement of his quest. He approached each of Pierrot's traps and deadfalls cautiously, and twice he showed his fangs—once at a marten that snapped at him from under a root where it had dragged the trap in which it was caught, and the second time at a big snowy owl that had come to steal bait and was now a prisoner at the end of a steel chain. It may be that Baree thought it was Oohoomisew and that he still remembered vividly the treacherous assault and fierce battle of that night when, as a puppy, he was dragging his sore and wounded body through the mystery and fear of the big timber. For he did more than to show his fangs. He tore the owl into pieces.

There were plenty of rabbits in Pierrot's traps, and Baree did not go hungry. He reached the second trap-line cabin late in the afternoon, after ten hours of traveling. He met with no very great disappointment here, for he had not anticipated very much. The snow had banked this cabin even higher than the other. It lay three feet deep against the door, and the window was white with a thick coating of frost. At this place, which was close to the edge of a big barren, and unsheltered by the thick forests farther back, Pierrot had built a shelter for his firewood, and in this shelter Baree made his temporary home. All the next day he remained somewhere near the end of the trap-line, skirting the edge of the barren and investigating the short side line of a dozen traps which Pierrot and Nepeese had strung through a swamp in which there had been many signs of lynx. It was the third day before he set out on his return to the Gray Loon.

He did not travel very fast, spending two days in covering the twenty-five miles between the first and the second trap-line cabins. At the second cabin he remained for three days, and it was on the ninth day that he reached the Gray Loon. There was no change. There were no tracks in the snow but his own, made nine days ago.

Baree's quest for Nepeese became now more or less involuntary, a sort of daily routine. For a his burrow in the dog-corral, and at least twice between dawn and darkness he would go to the birch-bark tepee and the chasm. His trail, soon beaten hard in the snow, became as fixed as Pierrot's trap-line.

And then, of a sudden, Baree made a change. He spent a night in the tepee. After that, whenever he was at the Gray Loon, during the day he always slept in the tepee. The two blankets were his bed—and they were a part of Nepeese. And there, all through the long winter, he waited.

The winter passed; and spring came, and still Baree continued to haunt his old trails, even going now and then over the old trap-line as far as the first of the two cabins. The traps were rusted and sprung now; the thawing snow disclosed bones and feathers between their jaws; under the deadfalls were remnants of fur, and out on the ice of the lakes were picked skeletons of foxes and wolves that had taken the poison-baits. The last snow went. The swollen streams sang in the forests and canyons. The grass turned green, and the first flowers came.

All these things were happening, and the birds had mated and nested, and still Nepeese did not come! And at last something broke inside of Baree, his last hope, perhaps, his last dream; and one day he bade good-by to the Gray Loon.

No one can say what it cost him to go; no one can say how he fought against the things that were holding him to the tepee, the old swimming-pool, the familiar paths in the forest, and the two graves that were not so lonely now under the tall spruce. He went. He had no reason—simply went. It may be that there is a Master whose hand guides the beast as well as the man, and that we know just enough of this guidance to call it instinct. For, in dragging himself away, Baree faced the Great Adventure.

It was there, in the north, waiting for him—and into the north he went.

* * * * * * *

It was early in August when Baree left the Gray Loon. He had no objective in view. But there was still left upon his mind, like the delicate impression of light and shadow on a negative, the memories of his earlier days. Things and happenings that he had almost forgotten recurred to him, as his trail led him farther and farther away from the Gray Loon; and his earlier experiences became real again, pictures thrown out afresh in his mind by the breaking of the last ties that held him to the home of the Willow. Involuntarily he followed the trail of these impressions—of these past happenings, and slowly they helped to build up new interests for him. He came to the blind canyon up which Nepeese and Pierrot had chased him. That seemed but yesterday. He entered the little meadow, and stood beside the great rock that had almost crushed the life out of the Willow's body; and then he remembered where Wakayoo, his big bear friend, had died under Pierrot's rifle—and he smelled of Wakayoo's whitened bones where they lay scattered in the green grass, with flowers growing up among them.

And now, for the first time in many weeks, a bit of the old-time eagerness put speed into Baree's feet. Memories that had been hazy and indistinct through forgetfulness were becoming realities again, and as he would have returned to the Gray Loon had Nepeese been there so now, with something of the feeling of a wanderer going home, he returned to the old beaver-pond.

All through the month of August Baree made the beaver-pond his headquarters. At times his excursions kept him away for two or three days at a time. These journeys were always into the north, sometimes a little east and sometimes a little west, but never again into the south. And at last, early in September, he left the beaver-pond for good.

It was almost December when Lerue, a halfbreed from Lac Bain, saw Baree's footprints in freshly fallen snow, and a little later caught a flash of him in the bush.

"Mon Dieu, I tell you his feet are as big as my hand, and he is as black as a raven's wing with the sun on it!" he exclaimed in the Company's store at Lac Bain. "A fox? Non! He is half as big as a bear. A wolf—oui! And black as the devil, M'sieus."

McTaggart was one of those who heard. He was putting his signature in ink to a letter he had written to the Company when Lerue's words came to him. His hand stopped so suddenly that a drop of ink spattered on the letter. Through him there ran a curious shiver as he looked over at the halfbreed. Just then Marie came in. McTaggart had brought her back from her tribe. Her big, dark eyes had a sick look in them, and some of her wild beauty had gone since a year ago.

With scarcely a sound that the others could hear Marie had whispered into the Factor's ear, and folding his letter McTaggart rose quickly and left the store. He was gone an hour. Lerue and the others were puzzled. It was not often that Marie came into the store; it was not often that they saw her at all. She remained hidden in the Factor's log house, and each time that he saw her Lerue thought that her face was a little thinner than the last, and her eyes bigger and hungrier looking. In his own heart there was a great yearning. Many a night he passed the little window beyond which he knew that she was sleeping; often he looked to catch a glimpse of her pale face, and he lived in the one happiness of knowing that Marie understood, and that into her eyes there came for an instant a different light when their glances met. No one else knew. The secret lay between them—and patiently Lerue waited and watched. "Some day," he kept saying to himself—"Some day"—and that was all.

Lerue was thinking of this when McTaggart returned at the end of the hour. The Factor came straight up to where the half dozen of them were seated about the big box stove, and with a grunt of satisfaction shook the freshly fallen snow from his shoulders.

"Pierre Eustach has accepted the government's offer, and is going to guide the map-making party up into the Barrens this winter," he announced. "You know, Lerue—he has a hundred and fifty traps and deadfalls set, and a big poison-bait country. A good line, eh? And I have leased it of him for the season. It will give me the outdoor work I need—three days on the trail, three days here. Eh, what do you say to the bargain?"

"It is good," said Lerue.

"Yes, it is good," said Roget.

"A wide fox country," said Mons Roule.

"And easy to travel," murmured Valence in a voice that was almost like a woman's.

"Ghost-Fear" Strong Among Real Romanys

If, during a country stroll, you come to a clear-running stream or river, and notice at the bottom a collection of broken crockery, kettles, pans, and so on, you may be sure that a gypsy camp is near, and that a gypsy has died there.

On that day after the funeral of a real Romany, the relations burn all the clothes and other consumable belongings of the dead person. Then all the crockery and utensils are broken and solemnly thrown into the nearest running water.

Behind this queer custom lies "ghost-fear." It is believed that, so long as any of the possessions of a dead gypsy remain intact, his ghost will "walk" and ill-luck and misfortune will dog the camp. Sometimes, so strong is this superstition, even the horse of a dead gypsy is destroyed.

Gypsies never utter the names of the dead, and for a long time after a death will not eat or drink anything that was a favorite with the departed. This is "ghost-fear" again.

Rarely, if ever, are flowers placed on a gypsy's grave. Some little possession that they loved in life—a toy for a child, or a blackened teapot, broken first, for an old woman, and so on—is the usual choice.

Hot Bowlders Make Bath

The Currier Indians along the Thompson river, in British Columbia, have a crude Turkish bath. They roll big bowlders into a blazing bonfire until they are very hot, and then they roll them back into their homes, shut the doors and after divesting themselves of clothes, lie on a cot near the large heated stones. The effect is that of a Turkish bath. To top off the bath the "bathers" take a quick and brief plunge into the river for what corresponds to the cold shower of civilization.

Why It Is

"I cannot understand," mused Professor Pate, "how it is that women are almost invariably regarded as superior to men."

"Because they say they are, of course!" promptly replied old Gaunton Grimm.—Kansas City Star.

NELLIE REVELL Says:

THE first year! Just a year ago I was reborn into the world, left the hospital and came back to my own again. It has been a busy and a happy year, but, as Frank Craven says of married life in his play, the first year of convalescence is the hardest. But I would not trade it, with its multitude of joys and thrills, and even its few heartaches, for any other year in my life. It has been a fitting sequel to the great adventure of my four years in the hospital, and in it I think I have learned more of the quirks of human nature than I did in the four preceding it.

I was able to sit up only for a short while each day. My walking was confined to a few steps now and then—mostly then—and I was still in considerable pain. Looking back on myself as I was I can realize how rapid and how marked has been my improvement. True, I occasionally have days when I know I am not entirely well, and yet my improvement, as seen from day to day, does not appear so great. But a list of the things I can do shows me that it all has not been an empty day dream.

The pain has almost left me. I can sit up all the day long if I wish. Walking is getting to be a habit for me instead of an experience. The medicines I have to take now can be numbered on the fingers of one hand, instead of an adding machine. Casts and braces are still my constant companions, but the need of wearing them is more than counterbalanced by the many blessings of the year. I have given away my wheel chair to some one who needs it more than I do.

The year, also, has not been bare of other physical accomplishments. It has been a busy one and therein lies, I believe, a major reason for the recovery I have made. In that time I have had my book released, have distributed it and autographed many hundred copies. There has been this column to keep up, one in the New York Evening Telegram and another for Variety, the first theatrical paper in the world. I have written two magazine stories (and sold them, too), attended a number of theaters, been guest of honor at a Friars' dinner, have been motoring, have had dinner once again in a private home, attended three luncheons of the Theatrical Press Representatives, been to Coney Island once and to Atlantic City twice, and—have had my hair bobbed and a permanent—tolerably permanent—wave built into it. It has been a wonderful, colorful, eventful year. I am so grateful to God and my friends.

I am not foolish enough to think that I won my fight for life alone. I know that it was God's mercy and the result of many prayers. I know that it was the very fine care that I received at the hands of my doctor, who was a tool in God's work.

Five years ago I was carried into a hospital on a stretcher and "dumped" on a fracture board, and left there to vegetate. I couldn't even feed myself; it was then I began to take stock of myself and realize that I was a physical and financial bankrupt; that I had been shell-shocked in the battle of life. I started to pray, and prayed, believing that my prayers would be answered.

At the hospital there was a quaint pantry maid, her name was Katie. On the night preceding one of my operations Katie came into my room. "So you are going up in the morning?" she inquired. (Going up, means to the operating room). "Yes, Katie," I answered. "And who's going to do it?" she asked. "Doctor Stewart," I replied. "Oh, sure, he could take you apart and put you together again," said Katie. "I hope so," I answered. And as she left, I said: "Will you say a prayer for me, Katie?" "Indeed I will, ma'am—I'll pray like h—l for you."—And that's what I've been doing for myself.

"The wealthiest woman in the world" is what I have been called, and I admit the charge. I have few dollars in the world that I can call my own. I wouldn't know a tax-exempt security if I met one. I've never made a "killing" in oil, cotton or motors. I didn't have a Russian ruble in Bethlehem steel when it started soaring. And the proverbial ground floors of finance are always roof-gardens before I hear of them.

But in the Bank of Friendship there has been deposited in my name golden love, cheer, sympathy and comfort in such abundance that I have been blessed with daily dividends of courage, hope and happiness.

There is a line in the creed of the cynic to the effect that when you have no money you have no friends but my own case has taught me that such statement is a libel on the name of "Friend." If I had to be in trouble to find out who my real friends were, the revelations I received made every hour of suffering worth while. It is a joy to record that I have never had a single disappointment.

Let him make laws who would and play the king,
He rules who writes—the songs the people sing.

One reason so few women swear is that they won't listen to their husbands long enough to learn.

ORGANIZATIONS AND MOTHERS BOTH AGREE

Health of School Girls Important

The Girl Scouts and Camp Fire Girls are two national organizations, working side by side in the cause of healthy, happy, intelligent womanhood; training the minds of eager girls for greater service, training their bodies for the destiny that shall be theirs.

All honor to them! Wise mothers like Mrs. Alice Louthan, urge their daughters in their early teens to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Mrs. Louthan says—"I gave my fifteen-year old girl Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it did her a wonderful lot of good. She was out of school for four months. I read the advertisements of the Vegetable Compound, and since she has taken it she has improved and has gone back to school. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to other mothers with girls who are not as strong as they should be."—MRS. ALICE LOUTHAN, Route 2, Charleston, Illinois.

VAST TERRITORY IS BISHOP'S HOME

Aided Tenderfoots in Alaskan Gold Rush.

Seattle, Wash.—A vast territory towards the top of the world is "home" and "workshop" to Peter Trimble Rowe, who for thirty-one years has extended a helping hand to residents of the frozen North as missionary bishop of Alaska.

Today, at seventy years of age, the Episcopalian bishop looks forward to several more winters, extending the outposts of civilization farther to the north, ministering to his flock. Then he says he will give way to a younger man imbued with ardor for a difficult mission. Bishop Rowe makes his headquarters here.

Friend of explorer, Indian and Eskimo, Bishop Rowe's life is closely interwoven with the most interesting chapters in the history of Alaska. He was on the march with the "boys" in the gold rushes of the Yukon and Dawson and admits frankly his hope that there will be one more good find of gold.

He recalls how some gazed in amazement as they rushed along the trail to Dawson. He taught many tenderfoots, many of them lured from the city, how to fashion their own boats.

Aptitude for carpentry has served the bishop many times in his varied experiences. Various missions that dot the horizon of the north country bear testimony to his handiwork. Several were fashioned by his hands. It was in one of these missions that Stefansson, the explorer, was nursed back to life after being gripped by pneumonia and typhoid fever.

Bishop Rowe is proud of his record in never losing a dog in the thousands of miles he has traveled over the broad expanse of the Alaskan territory, much of it unknown to white men. For years he has piloted his own sledge in getting from mission to mission and ministering what he calls "practical Christianity."

Turns Buddhist and Bars Meat Eaters as Tenants

New York.—The secret of the "Hermit of Stanton Street," which for six years has been locked in the four-story building at No. 99 on that thoroughfare, has just been revealed.

Sam Doonieffsky, forty-two, who dwells alone there, explained that for six years, although tenants have clamored for rooms in the building, he has refused them all because they are "meat eaters."

When Doonieffsky purchased the building he ordered every one out. He admitted that he had forsaken the orthodox Jewish religion to become a Buddhist, and that one of the tenets upon which his life is now based is that it is wrong to kill. The building, situated in the heart of the East side, had long provided a mystery.

Doonieffsky, who sells linen, has lived a hermit's existence on the top floor, subsisting entirely on cabbages and potatoes, and poring over great tomes on science and religion. His only companion is a pet mouse. He will not keep a cat because, he said, he fears it would kill the mouse.

Reporters to Wear Top Hats Covering Riots

Paris.—Parisian newspaper reporters may wear high hats when covering assignments where trouble is likely to arise. Not as a matter of protection, but of identification.

Instances of reporters being injured in street frays have grown quite common, not due to the police growing more ferocious but because they are unable to distinguish between rioters and reporters. French news writers are beginning to appear on the scene of manifestations rather than remaining behind police lines and waiting for the news to reach them—as once was the custom.

Mother Is Refused Air Service for Youngsters

Chicago.—Because children are "perishable" matter, Mrs. J. Austin Allen of Chicago has been refused permission to have her two children brought to Chicago from Colorado Springs, Colo., by air mail.

Mrs. Allen in her desire to have the children back in the city in a hurry offered to Postmaster Ewing of Denver full postage rates.

Austrian Boy Is "Checked" to Indiana

Rushville, Ind.—The hands on the clock of time were turned back thirteen years for Morris Frisch, merchant, of this city, when he welcomed his son Leon, whom he had not seen since his birth in Austria, at Ellis island recently.

The boy was "checked" through and "insured" and arrived safely from the long voyage.

He was brought here by his father and expresses his delight at being in the "new world," though he speaks not a word of English.

Frisch owns several retail establishments in this part of the state. He has laid aside business cares for several days while he entertains his son with automobile rides to spots of interest in Indiana.

$9,000,000 IN 1925 SPENT ON GERM WAR

Rockefeller Foundation in World Campaign.

New York.—More than $9,000,000 was spent during 1925 by the Rockefeller Foundation in its campaign throughout the world against disease. Hookworm, yellow fever and malaria are the enemies of mankind its international health board especially aims to annihilate. This organization follows the policy of working only through governments of the countries to which it lends aid, and helps out only at the invitation of an official agency. It concerns itself only with new methods, one of its primary ends being to help a health official prove to his community the value of an innovation, but the board undertakes co-operation only with the clear understanding that the project in hand is eventually to stand on its own financial feet.

Worldwide War on Hookworm.

In 18 different countries and in 220 counties in 26 different states in our country the international health board backed up the local officials in their struggles with the hookworm problem, with the result that nearly 1,500,000 persons were treated.

Around hookworm disease as a nucleus the board has a general educational plan to instruct the populace of tropical and subtropical countries in sanitation and preventive measures against all disease. This idea has spread to Europe, and co-operation along these lines has been extended to France, Austria, Poland and Czechoslovakia.

In 1925 only three cases of yellow fever occurred in all the Americas, whereas formerly this disease made Central and South America, and even New Orleans and other cities of the Southern states, veritable pest holes. Now these same cities are represented to Northern tourists as health resorts with a fair degree of truth.

War on the mosquito that carries yellow fever has driven this former plague to a last stand in western Africa, where experts sent out by the international health board, at the invitation of the countries concerned, are hard at work holding it in check lest it gain access to other regions of the continent when the trans-African railways under construction are completed.

Fight Malaria With Paris Green.

A new use for paris green has been found in the contest with the malarial mosquito. Experience has shown that only by exterminating the insect that spreads the infection from person to person can malaria be stamped out, since, in the majority of cases, patients will not continue doses of quinine long enough to be completely cured. Paris green has proved effective, cheap and safe as a means of eradicating the fever mosquitoes.

In co-operation with the Italian government the board has been experimenting with the arsenic compound in Calabria and Sardinia, sprinkling the breeding areas with a powder composed of 99 parts road dust and one part paris green. The small quantity of poison killed the wigglers without harming the fish native to the waters, and mosquito breeding was stopped at very low cost.

Work on malaria was carried on in twelve states in the United States, and in the West Indies, Brazil, Argentina, Palestine, the Philippine islands and Ceylon.

Reports Man-Ape Tribe Akin to "Missing Link"

London.—A dispatch to the Daily Express from Johannesburg, South Africa, tells of an unnamed traveler who reports having encountered in the northern Katanga district of the Belgian Congo, a curious tribe of natives whose physical characteristics suggest "the missing link."

The traveler described one individual as half man and half ape. He was six feet tall and had an exceptionally long arm, a projecting jaw and a receding forehead. He had the normal negroid nose, woolly hair, startling black eyes, a straggly beard and was of exceptionally powerful physique.

California Man Possesses Smallest New Testament

San Francisco.—Possession of the world's smallest New Testament is claimed by Charles Benjamin of 3243 Sixteenth street, San Francisco.

Clearly printed and containing the entire New Testament, the book is but five-eighths of an inch in length, half an inch wide and a quarter of an inch thick.

The miniature book was given by a Samoan islands beachcomber as his most valued possession to the wife of a sea captain, who in turn presented it to Benjamin. It was printed in 1895 in Glasgow, Scotland.

South African Tables to Get Novel Steaks

Capetown.—Shark steak, like whale meat, which became popular on the western coast of the United States some years ago, has been placed on the South African market as a side issue of a scheme to gain cheap supplies of shark leather. The tail is considered the best cut for steaks.

Fins have long been eaten in China, the Archipelago, the Gold Coast, New Zealand and Japan. The chief drawback to shark meat is its oiliness, but dealers here say a process has been conceived to extract much of the oil without much expense

CREEK INDIANS CLAIM MILLIONS

Say Government Owes Them $29,084,500 for Land.

Washington.—Something of interest to students of Alabama history is developing from the suit filed by the Creek nation against the government for money claimed due in payment for lands ceded to the United States in 1814, said lands comprising 23,000,000 acres, "embracing almost all the present states of Georgia and Alabama and a large portion of the state of Mississippi."

This is the wording of the claim, but in 1814 the Creeks had jurisdiction not farther west than the rich country west of the Coosa, though ancestrally they had extended to Natchez land on the Mississippi. The land claim, therefore, appears to be considerably too large. The money value is figured at $1.25 an acre, or a total of $29,084,500. The land was undeveloped, much of it was hill and mountain land. The valuation is declared excessive.

The Creek war was fought not for the land the Creeks owned, but in order to punish those leaders and members of the nation who were aiding Great Britain in Great Britain's war with the United States. General Jackson's military operations were for the purpose of destroying the Creek nation's alliance with Great Britain against the American settlers of the coast region. At the end, when the Creek nation was crushed and the warring Creeks surrendered, a treaty of peace was entered into and Jackson was free to proceed against Pensacola, unhindered by the red man.

This suit was authorized by an act of congress in 1924, the Court of Claims being designated to give it a hearing.

Evidence of Spanish Battle Is Unearthed

Los Angeles, Calif.—Spanish conquistadors, under the leadership of the famous Cortez, fought a desperate battle on the famous golf course of the Los Angeles Athletic club at the Riviera, near Santa Monica, some time in the Sixteenth century. This fact was brought to light a few days ago when Doctor Morton, tree surgeon, unearthed piles of bones, which, because of their blue color, he declared to be at least 300 years old, says the Los Angeles Times.

Bedded in a giant sycamore tree which he is rejuvenating Doctor Morton first found a stone cannon ball, fired by the Spanish cannon which the conquerors of Mexico brought to the shores of California. This led to the additional discovery of the bones of the soldiers who undoubtedly waged war on the Indians they found here to dispute their conquest of the new land.

Member of 1 Family in 36 on Average Hit by Auto

New York.—Some member of your family has one chance in three in being killed or injured by an automobile this year. That is the risk indicated by figures on last year's motor accidents, gathered by the National Safety council and just made public through the National Bureau of Casualty and Surety Underwriters.

Persons killed by automobiles in the United States in 1925 numbered 22,500. At an estimate of 30 injured for each fatality, the number hurt was 675,000, making the total casualties $97,500. The one-in-thirty-six ratio is given on the basis of 25,000,000 families in the United States.

Those killed in 1925 numbered 2,200 more than in 1924. The automobile death rate increased to 17.2 per 100,000 in 1925. It was 15.7 in 1924 and 14.9 in 1923.

Frosts Affect Flowers; Perfume Prices to Jump

Grasse, France.—The price of perfume is destined to mount. Grasse, the perfume center of Europe, with 29 distilleries, will run short of 600,000 pounds of petals this year as a result of the late frosts and inclement weather which destroyed a fifth of the Riviera flower crop.

Manufacturers say this shortage will cause at least a 25 per cent increase in the cost of French perfumes.

The flower-growers, through their co-operative society, are able to force the distilleries to pay their prices. Rose leaves are now quoted at the equivalent of ten cents a pound, and orange flowers sell for fifteen cents.

Woman in Business of Catching Insects

Miami, Fla.—Collecting and breeding beautifully marked specimens of butterflies and moths is a business with Mrs. Elizabeth O. Groves. She has one of the largest laboratories of its nature in the country.

She receives orders for rare butterflies from scientific institutions and colleges that specialize in nature study, from jewelers and collectors.

During her first season she sold more than $400 worth of the tiny blue-winged butterfly that feeds on the coontie. This is said to be a rare specimen in other sections, but common in Florida. Mrs. Groves also collects grasshoppers. One order was for 10,000 grasshoppers.

Prospector Gone From Klondike Gold Region

The richest gold area in Alaska was not far from the site of Carmack's discovery, along Bonanza and Eldorado creeks. The finest vein was the Eldorado paystreak, four miles long, which yielded gold to the value of $1,200 a running foot. The whole Klondike region's highest yield was in 1900 when $22,000,000 was taken out. To 1915 the total production was about $162,000,000. Before 1906 the annual production had been greatly reduced, and by 1910 the richest gravels had all been worked out. Dawson, the next year, had dropped in population to 3,103, while the prospector and his pan had long since given way, as in other placer regions, to the well-organized and economical equipment of the syndicate and the corporation.

Taking the Long Route

John Philip Sousa, the bandmaster, said at a banquet in New York: "To succeed in grand opera here at home, American girls first go abroad and succeed in Paris, London, Milan and Naples. The longest way 'round in their case is the shortest way home, you see.

"It's like Smith.

"'So your beautiful young wife refused to marry you when you first proposed?' I said to Smith in the course of a confidential chat. 'Did you keep on pursuing her until she consented?'

"'Not much!' said Smith. 'I went out and made a fortune. After that it was she who did the pursuing.'"—Musical America.

Introducing the Snake

Mrs. Curtis, who is just an ordinary woman who lives on Park avenue and is not unusually sensitive, contributes the best taxi story of the week. She got into a cab at Nineteenth street and after settling herself comfortably, looked about. There was a large black snake in the opposite corner of the back seat. In response to her screams the driver stopped the car and opened the door.

"I'm sorry, lady," he said. "The last fare I had, had a box of them things."

She says he then called the reptile by a scientific name and proceeded to fondle it. "I used to work in the Bronx zoo in the snake house," he explained.—New Yorker.

Irish to Mint Coins

Ireland is to mint her own coins for the first time in a hundred years. The law assimilating Ireland's currency with that of England was passed in 1825, but the Free State parliament recently decided to establish a token silver, nickel and copper coinage for amounts up to 40 shillings (about $10). Eminent artists have been asked to assist the government in the designs of the new coins. The first Irish coins were struck by the Danish kings of Dublin in the Tenth or Eleventh century, and in medieval times there were mints in Dublin, Waterford, Tuan and Drougheda.

The 1926 Slogan

Cortlandt Bleecker, sitting in a New York night club, indicated a half dozen tables occupied by sleek young gigolos and elderly or even old women a-glitter with diamonds.

"In the past," said Mr Bleecker, "we night-lifers had for our slogan, 'Be young while you can,' but these rich female veterans here have made that slogan weak and old-fashioned. For the last ten years they've been young while they couldn't."

Promoting Silk Culture

Mrs. Rose Castiglione of Tacoma, Wash., is endeavoring to establish sericulture on Puget sound. She obtained 3,000 silkworm eggs from Italy. To incubate them she wrapped them carefully, placed them next to her body and let the heat hatch them. She has put them on a mulberry leaf diet and expects to know soon whether silk can be grown profitably in that climate.

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

On Fifteen Per Cent Bonds

Mrs. Norris beamed as she greeted Aunt Emmy and exclaimed, "Now I know all my financial worries are over! I wanted to tell you right away—"

"What have you bought this time?" Aunt Emmy demanded suspiciously.

"Well, I haven't paid the money over yet, but I have found the loveliest investment where my money will be perfectly safe and will earn a nice income for me right away," Mrs. Norris said. "I'm going to buy bonds, good safe bonds, that will pay me fifteen per cent interest—"

"Wait a minute, you'll have to go some, Maud Norris, to tell me about 'good safe bonds' that pay fifteen per cent!" Aunt Emmy broke in.

"They are safe,—the man said so and this booklet says so too!"

"Do you know what a bond is?" asked Aunt Emmy.

"No, but it's awfully safe. I'm sure of that," Mrs. Norris said. "Everybody knows that bonds are safe—"

"My dear, some bonds are safe and some are not. When you buy a bond you simply lend your money to the company putting out the bonds. Bond issues are secured generally by the company mortgaging or pledging some of its property. In other words, it offers a certain asset as security that it will return your money to you on the date the bond matures. It agrees to pay you a certain sum each year for the use of your money, usually something between five and eight per cent. No company can afford to pay too much for its money—and as to fifteen per cent bonds—why it would be very unusual for a company to be able to earn enough to enable it to pay fifteen per cent for the privilege of using other people's money,—moreover, if it is good enough to borrow money at all it can borrow it more cheaply than that!"

"Oh dear!" wailed Mrs. Norris, "then a bond isn't a good safe investment—"

"Don't jump at conclusions so fast!" said Aunt Emmy. "I did not say that. A bond is as safe as a church if the company that issues it is financially sound, has a high credit rating and is making money. Before you buy bonds assure yourself that the company behind them is above reproach."

"But the man who told me about these fifteen per cent bonds was so earnest—I felt sure I could believe him."

"Don't turn over any money to him until you have some advice on the bonds from your bank," admonished Aunt Emmy. "Then, if you find out that the bonds are questionable you will escape another bad investment."

HOW MUCH ARE YOU WORTH TO YOUR FARM?

If you want to know how much a man is worth, count the number of "HORSEPOWER" that he can keep profitably employed, for as a man's capacity to organize and direct the work of others grows, the profits from his business will increase.

The electric motor as adapted to the farm provides in economical and compact form the working capacity of many men and animals. It gives the farmer geater freedom for the planning and supervision that constitutes his real value to the farm. It pumps water automatically, makes a child's play of sawing wood, grinds feed and does dozens of other tasks, all a part of the every day operation of the farm.

Science has created electric appliances to relieve men and women of their burdens, and on the farm it is the symbol of an age to come—an age in which electricity shall do for agriculture the kind of service which has revolutionized modern industry, transportation, and the home.

Our plan for Rural Electric Service, the kind that brings to your farm an unlimited supply of energy for your needs, is meeting with more favor each day. An ever increasing number of farm owners are on our lines enjoying the same service as is possible in the cities and towns.

Electric power has brought wealth to many industries. Is there any reason why it cannot do the same thing for agriculture?

The Biggest Little Paper In Marshall County

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, July 30, 1926. Volume 16; Number 13.

Pennington Co. Fair To Be Best Ever This Year

The Pennington County Agricultural Society is this year endeavoring to make the fair one of the largest and best ever held in Northern Minnesota. The free acts and fireworks program far outdistances anything else that has ever been staged in Thief River Falls.

The Northern Exposition Shows have seven large tent shows featuring: Creations in Wax, Temple of Mystery, Circus Side-Show, "Aloha"—The Show Beautiful Hawaiian Theatre, the Alligator Farm, and the motordrome. This motordrome will show exciting, fascinating, daring riders in suicidal attempts to scale the walls of the Mammoth Drome, showing a thrill every minute. In addition to the tent shows, there will be four high class riding devices, manned by clean, careful, courteous operators.

Horse racing will be held during the second and third day of the fair. A local race for horses from Pennington, Marshall, Polk, Red Lake, and Roseau counties will be staged on Thursday, August 5th. $250.00 is reserved for specials, in addition to the regular harness races on August 5 and 6.

The fireworks program held in the evening of August 4, and 5 will show many scenes relating to the progress of the country from 1776 to 1926. The Thearle-Duffield fireworks are the best in America and give a wonderful exhibition of high class fireworks.

Is your subscription due? If so, please pay up.

Mason County, Michigan, bankers are pushing hard to replace scrub stock with pure-bred cattle. The plan as outlined by the county agent is to purchase young pure-bred sires and place them wherever a farmer is found who is willing to co-operate in the proposition. The bankers will advance the purchase price and take a note for one year without interest. The idea is to make it as easy as possible for the farmers to procure thoroughbreds.

May Enter Polical Game

Deputy-Sheriff John P. Bordewich has received a letter from Ray Posch, of Beltrami county, whom he recently took to the state hospital at Fergus Falls by order of the probate court, demanding that he secure his release from that institution "pronto and to once", or he will cease to regard him as his friend and will not only no longer support him in his candidacy for sheriff but will, when he is let out, enter the lists against him as an independent candidate. Posch maintains that he is unjustly deprived of his liberty and should be set free without delay.—Register.

Dorcas Ice-Cream Social

The Dorcas Society is planning on an ice-cream social to be held on the evening of August 8.

A program will be rendered and ice-cream, made from cream produced in this community, will be served, if we get enough.

We know you are all interested in the Dorcas society and wish its success. We will appreciate your help both in planning and donating.

Those of you who can donate cream please notify any of the Dorcas girls at an early date.

We also need sugar and coffee if anyone wishes to donate them.

After a Drink of Moon
(From Various Sources)

It was a nice October eve
Last August in July;
The moon lay thick upon the ground;
The mud shone in the sky.
The flowers were singing sweetly;
The birds were all in bloom.
I went down in the cellar
To sweep an upstairs room.
I saw, a thousand miles away,
A house just out of sight;
Another funny thing I saw—
Two cats have a dog-fight.
Don't weary of this cra-Z pome;
The end is coming soon—
I saw a bottle of White Mule—
A cow jumped over the moon.
(That happened in a pasture.)
My 4d was speeding slow
When I came down from my cellar
To the upstairs down below.

September 9 Will Be Farm Bureau Fair Day

Thursday, September 9, has been selected as the annual Farm Bureau day at the 1926 Minnesota state fair.

It has been the custom in late years for the state Farm Bureau to have an open house meeting at the fair for the farmers to meet socially and to discuss mutual problems. Able speakers are secured for these meetings and this year will be no exception. The farm women are given a prominent part in the affair and a good woman speaker will address the meeting.

Short Pasture Crop Hits Cattle Market

The dry weather conditions this season in western Minnesota and the Dakotas has produced an exceptionally heavy run of cattle shipments for this time of the year, according to J. S. Montgomery, general manager of the Central Co-operative Commission association at South St. Paul.

This dumping of cattle onto the market has resulted in a break of from 75c to $1 a hundred on grass cattle, and 22c to 50c on dry feds. The Central Association recommends that, insofar as conditions will permit, that cattle be held back on the farms for a few weeks.

Chapter XIII

The trap-line of Pierre Eustach ran thirty miles straight west of Lac Bain. It was not as long a line as Pierrot's had been, but it was like a main artery running through the heart of a rich fur country. It had belonged to Pierre Eustach's father, and his grandfather, and his great-grandfather, and beyond that it reached, Pierre averred, back to the very pulse of the finest blood in France. The books at McTaggart's post went back only as far as the great-grandfather end of it, the older evidence of ownership being at Churchill. It was the finest game country between Reindeer lake and the Barren Lands. It was in December that Baree came to it.

Again he was traveling southward in a slow and wandering fashion, seeking food in the deep snows. The Kistisew Kestin, or Great Storm, had come earlier than usual this winter, and for a week after it scarcely a hoof or claw was moving.

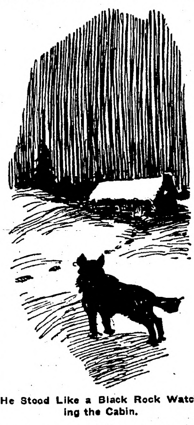
Every trapper from Hudson's bay to the country of the Athabasca knew that after the Big Storm the famished fur animals would be seeking food, and that traps and deadfalls properly set and baited stood the biggest chance of the year of being filled. Some of them set out over their trap-lines on the sixth day; some on the seventh, and others on the eighth. It was on the seventh day that Bush McTaggart started over Pierre Eustach's line, which was now his own for the season. It took him two days to uncover the traps, dig the snow from them, rebuild the fallen "trap-houses," rearrange the baits. On the third day he was back at Lac Bain.

It was on this day that Baree came to the cabin at the far end of McTaggart's line. McTaggart's trail was fresh in the snow about the cabin, and the instant Baree sniffed of it every drop of blood in his body seemed to leap suddenly with a strange excitement. It took perhaps half a minute for the scent that filled his nostrils to associate itself with what had gone before, and at the end of that half-minute there rumbled in Baree's chest a deep and sullen growl. For many minutes after that he stood like a black rock in the snow, watching the cabin. Then slowly he began circling about it, drawing nearer and nearer, until at last he was sniffing at the threshold. No sound or smell of life came from inside, but he could smell the old smell of McTaggart. Then he faced the wilderness—the direction in which the trap-line ran back to Lac Bain. He was trembling. His muscles twitched. He whined. Pictures were assembling more and more vividly in his mind—the fight in the cabin, Nepeese, the wild chase through the snow to the chasm's edge—even the memory of that age-old struggle when McTaggart had caught him in the rabbit snare. In his whine there was a great yearning, almost expectation. Then it died slowly away. After all, the scent in the snow was of a thing that he had hated and wanted to kill, and not of anything that he had loved. For an instant nature had impressed on him the significance of associations—a brief space only, and then it was gone. The whine died away, but in its place came again that ominous growl.

Slowly he followed the trail and a quarter of a mile from the cabin struck the first trap on the line. Hunger had caved in his sides until he was like a starved wolf. In the first trap-house McTaggart had placed as bait the hind-quarter of a snowshoe rabbit. Baree reached in cautiously. He had learned many things on Pierrot's line: he had learned what the snap of a trap meant; he had felt the cruel pain of steel jaws; he knew better than the shrewdest fox what a deadfall would do when the trigger was sprung—and Nepeese herself had taught him that he was never to touch poison-bait. So he closed his teeth gently in the rabbit flesh and drew it forth as cleverly as McTaggart himself could have done. He visited five traps before dark, and ate the five baits without springing a pan. Then he went on into a warm balsam swamp and found himself a bed for the night.

The next day saw the beginning of the struggle that was to follow between the wits of man and beast. To Baree the encroachment of Bush McTaggart's trap-line was not war; it was existence. It was to furnish him food, as Pierrot's line had furnished him food for many weeks. But he sensed the fact that in this instance he was law-breaker and had an enemy to outwit. Had it been good hunting weather he might have gone on, for the unseen hand that was guiding his wanderings was drawing him slowly but surely back to the old beaver pond and the Gray Loon. As it was, with the snow deep and soft under him—so deep that in places he plunged into it over his ears—McTaggart's trap-line was like a trail of manna made for his special use. He followed in the factor's snowshoe tracks, and in the third trap killed a rabbit. Starved for many days, he was filled with a wolfish hunger, and before the day was over he robbed the bait from a full dozen of McTaggart's traps. Three times he struck poison-baits—venison or caribou fat in the heart of which was a dose of strychnine, and each time his keen nostrils detected the danger.

The second day, being less hungry and more keenly alive to the hated smell of his enemy, Baree ate less but was more destructive. McTaggart was not as skillful as Pierre Eustach in keeping the scent of his hands from the traps and "houses," and every now and then the smell of him was strong in Baree's nose. This wrought in Baree a swift and definite antagonism, a steadily increasing hatred where a few days before hatred was almost forgotten. The dog did not add two and two together to make four; he did not go back step by step to prove to himself that the man to whom this trap-line belonged was the cause of all his griefs and troubles—but he did find himself possessed of a deep and yearning hatred. McTaggart was the one creature except the wolves that he had ever hated; it was McTaggart who had hurt him, McTaggart who had hurt Pierrot, McTaggart who had made him lose his beloved Nepeese—and McTaggart was here on this trap-line! If he had been wandering before, without object or destiny, he was given a mission now. It was to keep to the traps. To feed himself. And to vent his hatred and his vengeance as he lived.



He Stood Like a Black Rock Watching the Cabin.

The second night Baree lay with a full stomach in a thicket of banksian pine; the third day he was traveling westward over the trap-line again.

Early on this morning Bush McTaggart started out to gather his catch, and where he crossed the stream six miles from Lac Bain he first saw Baree's tracks. He stopped to examine them with sudden and unusual interest, falling at last on his knees, whipping off the glove from his right hand, and picking up a single hair.

"The black wolf!"

He uttered the word in an odd, hard voice, and involuntarily his eyes turned straight in the direction of the Gray Loon. After that, even more carefully than before, he examined one of the clearly impressed tracks in the snow. When he rose to his feet there was in his face the look of one who had made an unpleasant discovery.

"A black wolf!" he repeated, and shrugged his shoulders. "Bah! Lerue is a fool. It is a dog." And then, after a moment, he muttered in a voice scarcely louder than a whisper, "her dog."

All that day Bush McTaggart followed a trail where Baree had left traces of his presence. Trap after trap he found robbed. And from the first disturbing excitement of his discovery of Baree's presence his humor changed slowly to one of rage, and his rage increased as the day dragged out. He was not unacquainted with four-footed robbers of the trap-line, but usually a wolf or a fox or a dog who had grown adept in thievery troubled only a few traps. But in this case Baree was traveling straight from trap to trap, and his footprints in the snow showed that he stopped at each. There was, to McTaggart, almost a human devilishness to his work. He evaded the poisons. Not once did he stretch his head or paw within the danger zone of a deadfall. For apparently no reason whatever he had destroyed a splendid mink, whose glossy fur lay scattered in worthless bits over the snow. Toward the end of the day McTaggart came to a deadfall in which a lynx had died. Baree had torn the silvery flank of the animal until the skin was of less than half value. McTaggart cursed aloud, and his breath came hot.

The third day McTaggart did not return to Lac Bain, but began a cautious hunt for Baree. An inch or two of fresh snow had fallen, and as if to take even greater measure of vengeance from his man-enemy Baree had left his footprints freely within a radius of a hundred yards of the cabin. It was half an hour before McTaggart could pick out the straight trail, and he followed this for two hours into a thick banksian swamp. Baree kept with the wind. Now and then he caught the scent of his pursuer; a dozen times he waited until the other was so close he could hear the snap of brush, or the metallic click of twigs against his rifle barrel. And then, with a sudden inspiration that brought the curses afresh to McTaggart's lips, he swung in a wide circle and cut straight back for the trap-line. When the Factor reached the line, along toward noon, Baree had already begun his work. He had killed and eaten a rabbit; he had robbed three traps in the distance of a mile, and he was headed again straight over the trap-line for Post Lac Bain.

It was the fifth day that Bush McTaggart returned to his post. He was in an ugly mood. Only Valence of the four Frenchmen was there, and it was Valence who heard his story, and afterward heard him cursing Marie. She came into the store a little later, big-eyed and frightened, one of her cheeks flaming red where McTaggart had struck her.

Chapter XIV

By the middle of January the war between Baree and Bush McTaggart had become more than an incident—more than a passing adventure to the beast, and more than an irritating happening to the man. It was, for the time, the elemental raison d'etre of their lives. Baree hung to the trap-line. He haunted it like a devastating specter, and each time that he sniffed afresh the scent of the Factor from Lac Bain he was impressed still more strongly with the instinct that he was avenging himself upon a deadly enemy. Again and again he outwitted McTaggart; he continued to strip his traps of their bait; the humor grew in him more strongly to destroy the fur he came across; his greatest pleasure came to be—not in eating, but in destroying. The fires of his hatred burned fiercer as the weeks passed, until at last he would snap and tear with his long fangs at the snow where McTaggart's feet had passed. And all of the time, away back of his madness, there was a vision of Nepeese that continued to grow more and more clearly in his brain. That first great loneliness—the loneliness of the long days and longer nights of his waiting and seeking on the Gray Loon, oppressed him again as it had oppressed him in the early days of her loss. On starry or moonlit nights he sent forth his wailing cries for her again, and Bush McTaggart, listening to them in the middle of the night, felt strange shivers run up his spine.

Varied Ideas About Money and Its Uses

Probably more has been said and written about money than any other subject under the sun. Fielding, who spoke with the authority of a magistrate, once commented that "money is the fruit of evil as often as the root of it." Doctor Johnson said, "Money, in whatever hands, will confer power." In "The Way of All Flesh," Samuel Butler wrote that "money is like a reputation for ability—more easily made than kept." His modern disciple, G. Bernard Shaw, goes farther and says, "Any fool can save money; it takes a wise man to spend it." Bacon wrote, "Money is like manure; of little use unless it be spread." A quotation from Horace reads, "Money amassed either serves or rules us."

John Stuart Mill, in his monumental work, "The Principles of Political Economy," points out that furs, cowrie shells and even cubes of compressed tea have been used in various places as money. He goes on to say that "money is a commodity and its value is determined, like other commodities, temporarily by demand and supply, permanently and on the average by cost of production."

No article about money would be complete without quoting an American. It seems typical of the American mind always to couple money with work—they rarely refer to the one without the other. Thus John D. Rockefeller: "I determined that, in addition to working for money, I would make money work for me."—John o' London's Weekly.

TWO TIMES FIVE IS TEN

By JACK WOODFORD

(©. 1926. Western Newspaper Union.)

HENRY T. VAN TYLE had all the appearance of being a man of parts—well polished parts. His correct, corded Norfolk suit, combined with light tan shoes and pearl-gray fedora, small, almost diminutive pearl pin, completed a sartorial symphony calculated to insure respect, even in Evanston, where good clothes are the order of the day; where opulence and excellent credit connections are the rule.

When he walked up to the desk Sidney Mason, the assistant cashier of a bank, understood this in a way which no amount of elucidation on paper will illustrate satisfactorily.

"Mr. Mason?" said the stranger in a Palm Beach-Coronado-Newport tone, as he pulled off his gloves.

"The name stands for service," replied Mr. Mason, with smile number three, which he usually reserved for the bank officers over him, and the directors. "The name stands for service," very snappy; he had seen it used in a story featuring a bank cashier in a "modish" Manhattan trust company.

"I would like to open a small commercial account," went on the stranger, ruffling the surface of his immaculate ensemble of haberdashery in order to pull forth a wallet that looked as though it were made of the leather taken from the back of a prize Pomeranian.

"I see," soothed Mason, reaching for the collection of ambiguous blanks which recorded legally such an intention.

"Just sign your name at the bottom of those two cards and I'll fill them out for you." The "I'll fill them out for you," meant that Sidney was sure that the account was to be opened for not less than ten thousand dollars.

The stranger signed his name neatly: "Henry T. Van Tyle," another point that impressed Mason favorably at once. All the nouveau riche, parvenus, charlatans, and plain busted bums—with a good front left—signed their names using a first initial with the second name spelled out in full. Producing three five thousand dollar bills, Van Tyle laid them upon the counter. Mason gathered them up, glanced as insuspiciously as possible at the numbers upon them to see if they were unevenly printed (a counterfeit can almost invariably be detected by the roughly printed serial numbers) entered upon a white deposit slip, "fifteen thousand dollars," and after it, gloatingly, "currency."

These formalities over, the stranger engaged Mr. Mason in lofty conversation. They spoke about the university activities; the possibility of Evanston ever being incorporated into Chicago proper; the Mount mystery—the stranger somehow had a way of impressing even a blase bank officer to whom wealthy old families are a drug on the active interest. Van Tyle was never too enthusiastic, never overcordial, spoke of nothing but the conventional things. He was the last man on earth to whom Mason would have thought of telling his story about "we have no bananas." At last the stranger waxed a little more confidential.

"I've been in the men's furnishings business all my life; have stores in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Ann Arbor; thinking of establishing a store out here, to cater to the university trade. Always made a specialty of that class of custom—know how to handle 'em. Thought I'd drop out myself and look over the possibilities of some locations that I've had recommended to me by one of your realtors. Fact is, that's why I brought that fifteen thousand along with me—thought I'd settle matters right off if I came across anything I liked. You people don't know me, so I brought along cash. Kind of risky to carry it around though."

"Yes, that's right," agreed Mason, "but you still have it in liquid form—if you want to make a deal just have any one of our local business men call me up."

"Oh, I'll not trouble you," responded the Norfolked one airily, glancing about the bank and somehow conveying the impression that he thought it was an excellent bank, without saying so or moving an eyebrow. "If I need it I'll come back here and get it; you don't know me yourself and you'd be perfectly right in being rather careful in recommending me over the phone—I'll not trouble you at all." With that he was gone, leaving Sidney Mason tremendously impressed—and Sidney was not one of those who usually believe in love at first sight where business matters are concerned, either. The new customer had had that indefinable air of one who does not want favors of any kind, which impresses a banker more than anything else in the world—next to spot cash, in the form of currency.

About one-thirty that afternoon Van Tyle came back. He walked up to the marble counter and waited tolerantly while Mason maneuvered the opening of a checking account for a student—on a one hundred dollar initial deposit; the student was filling out his own cards.

"Well, Mr. Mason," he said, "I'm afraid I'll have to trouble you. I've found just the place—need ten thousand of that money right away—perhaps I can make up for the bother I'm causing you later on, when my store gets under way; we'll keep our business accounts here of course," Mr. Mason beamed.

"Just write out your check, Mr. Van Tyle, and present it to the payer—he will cash it—I've advised him that you might be in today wanting a large amount in currency"—unbeknown to Mr. Van Tyle, Mason had sent a messenger clear down to the Federal Reserve bank in Chicago to change the three five thousand dollar bills; even a bank cashier can never be sure of detecting counterfeits nowadays, for under the new systems of photographic plates, even the serial numbers are sometimes almost perfect. Van Tyle lingered; Mason ignored the student utterly and leaned forward attentively. Van Tyle held a check in his hand, drawn on his first blank check in the book Mason had delivered to him that morning.

"Perhaps if you'll O. K. this, Mr. Mason, there won't be any confusion at the window. I know how paying tellers regard ten thousand dollar checks, presented by utter strangers."

"Oh, our payer won't hold you up," promised Mason, as he obligingly put his O. K., upon the face of the check. "Feel right at home here, Mr. Van Tyle. Of course, on large amounts, the payers will probably use their telautographs to the bookkeeping department; but, I've marked your deposit 'currency' so there'll be no hold up whatsoever there." Van Tyle smiled his thanks and left the counter. Mason turned back to the student brusquely.

Walking to the center of the room, where the customer's counter was located, Van Tyle took up a pen, scratched out the name of the bank at the top of the check, and substituted the name of a bank in Lowndesboro, Ala. Advancing to the paying teller's wicket he presented the check, at the same time taking from his pocket the check book Mason had given him, writing out another check for ten thousand on that bank. The payer took up the first check and hesitated.

"Didn't have one of my own blanks," explained Van Tyle, "so I just used one of your checks and filled in the name of my bank at the top; little unusual, I guess—you'll notice I had your Mr. Mason O. K. it." He finished writing the second check. "This check you'll find is covered by a cash deposit I made this morning—it will leave a balance of five thousand to my credit. Perhaps," added Mr. Van Tyle carelessly, "you'd rather I'd get this check O. K.'d, too?"

"Never mind," said the payer quickly. "I'll just get the bookkeeping department on it—won't take a second." He used his telautograph; back came the reply instantly, "O. K." Somehow the payer felt a little uneasy about the transaction. Still, Mr. Mason had cautioned him to be careful and not offend this new account. One check bore the assistant cashier's O. K., the other was covered by Van Tyle's balance; there was absolutely nothing over which a logical question could be raised. He counted out twenty one thousand dollar bills and shoved them through the window. Mr. Van Tyle gathered them up slowly, fitted them into his beautiful wallet, walked leisurely away, stopped a moment to bid Mr. Mason good afternoon, and was gone—forever and ever amen. . .

When the check came back from Lowndesboro four days later marked "no account," Mr. Mason tried to saddle the responsibility upon his payer, but that functionary immediately cleared himself, in the eyes of the vice president, by pointing to Mason's initialed "O. K."

"I wonder," reflected Mason, later, as he sadly recalled the incident, "why he didn't figure out some way to get that last five thousand out? Still, most anyone would be satisfied with having turned five thousand into ten, as the result of one day's work."

Thirteen Never Was Hoodoo to America

How can we account for the absurd superstition that 13 is an unlucky number? We do not know who is responsible for this belief, yet many a hotel omits 13 in numbering its floors. A big apartment house in Detroit has no room numbered 13. Seat No. 13 is hard to sell in the Pullman company's chair cars. Who among us has not somewhere in his list of friends, a man, or oftener a woman, who declines to sit at a table with just 12 other persons? Now let us tell you why no American should be superstitious about the number 13.

"Thirteen" is written all over our country. First, there were 13 colonies; then the first flag had 13 stars and 13 stripes. Revolutionary, which tells us of the greatest war, has 13 letters in it; so has "E Pluribus Unum" and "American eagle," our motto and our emblem. Now take the quarter of a dollar; there are 13 stars over the head of Liberty, 13 leaves in the olive branch held by the eagle, 13 thunderbolts in his talons, 13 bars on the shield, 13 feathers in each wing and 13 letters spell quarter dollar. Perry's great naval battle was fought in 1813 and resulted in the writing of "The Star-Spangled Banner." John Paul Jones has 13 letters in his name and was thirteen when he came to America. He carried the first flag of 13 stars to victory. The first fleet ordered by the American government consisted of 13 vessels.—Bookanwrap.

TWO WOMEN FOUND HELP

By Reading Experiences of Other Women

Mrs. Nina Matteson, Box 206, Oxford, N. Y., writes—"If it had not been for your medicine, I could not have done my work as it should have been done. Mother told me of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I had read in different papers what it had done for different women. She wanted me to try it, so my husband got me one bottle at first; then I took two others. Now I am feeling quite strong again."

Mrs. Ernest Tanguay of Adams, Mass., says she was ill for four years and could not sleep nights or go out on the street. She read about the Vegetable Compound and decided to try it. After taking eight bottles she was able to do all her work and go anywhere and is quite herself again.

This dependable Vegetable Compound is a household word in thousands of homes. The fourth generation is now learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

For more than half a century, this reliable medicine has been used by women with very satisfactory results. If the Vegetable Compound has helped other women, why shouldn't it help you?

A Lesson in Friendliness

By CYNTHIA BLAIR

(Copyright.)

"DON'T you find the city a frightfully lonely place?" Marian Hewitt asked the girl who worked at the desk next hers. "I've lived here for six months now, with my father and mother, and I don't know a soul, except a few friends of theirs. It's dreadful."

"Well, I've lived here for five, and I know lots of people," Helena Grant replied. "Somehow—oh, people are so kind; they seem to want to be friendly."

"Not the people I meet," Marian insisted. "Perhaps you live in a part of town where people are nicer—or go to a church where they're more friendly, or something. We go to a church near home. The minister is a friend of the minister in our church at home, but somehow, I haven't got acquainted at all."

"I live on Terry street," Helena told her. "No. 17."

"Why, that's just three blocks from where I live, on Ventnor avenue," Marian said. "How funny. We go to that church on the corner of Ventnor and Terry."

"So do I. That's the friendliest church I've ever known," Helena told her. "Listen, Marian—why don't you have dinner with me tonight, and go to prayer meeting with me afterward?"

Marian's lesson in friendliness began when they left the office. Helena stopped to buy a newspaper, and asked the newsboy how his mother was.

"His mother's been ill; I go to see her every few days, and take her some little thing," Helena explained. "She's a dear woman; was quite a musician, but her husband lost his money, and then died after a long illness, and now they're so poor that they have to earn money just anyway they can. She's a dear friend of mine."

Helena stopped at a fruit store on the way home, and chatted a bit with the woman who counted out oranges and apples for her.

"She's Greek," she told Marian. "I've had some long talks with her about Athens, where she used to live, and I've learned a lot about it, things I couldn't possibly have learned any other way. She's very interesting."

There was company at Helena's for dinner, a rather elderly man and his wife, whom Marian remembered seeing at church. She had met them, but had never got to know them; to her they seemed very distant, unlikely to be pleasant acquaintances.

"Anyway, such old people couldn't be friends of mine," she had added to herself.

Tonight, listening while the man talked of the work that he was doing as a bacteriologist, Marian was fairly swept off her feet. Never had she been more interested; bacteriology had been the subject that interested her most at school and she had longed for a chance to go on and make it her life work, but lack of funds had made that impossible, and she had learned stenography instead.

She said something about this to Mr. Whitcomb, who promptly asked her to visit his laboratory the following Saturday.

"It happens that I'm going to want an assistant before long," he told her. "And though you haven't had the necessary training, I think you would learn quickly. Anyway, come in to see me."

"They're such nice people, the Whitcombs," Helena told her, as they walked to prayer meeting that evening. "She doesn't hear very well, and so she's often left alone in a group of people, so I've always made it a point to talk with her."

At church that evening Helena seemed to know all the younger people whom Marian had thought she would never know.

"I don't see how you've done it," she told Helena, as they walked home. "I just can't understand."

"Well, when I was just a little girl, my mother told me that everybody was just a little bit lonely, in their hearts, and that I must always remember that, and remember, too, that if I wanted to know them, they'd want to know me, too. Before that I'd been sort of lonely and bashful and unhappy, but it changed everything for me. It will for you too, Marian. People will be friendly if you'll just go half way."

"But—you seem to know such interesting people," Marian told her.

"You could too. It's just that—well, you look at people and think 'Oh, they wouldn't be interesting!' But everybody's got something interesting about them if you just take the trouble to find it."

Marian agreed to that, half-heartedly. But as the days went by she found that it was a truth that worked. The woman who ran the tea-room where she ate her luncheon, the family who lived in the house next door to her own father's.

She went to work for Mr. Whitcomb, the bacteriologist, but it was only a few months until she left him, to be married to the assistant rector of the very church which she had thought so unfriendly.

"I'd never have known him if it hadn't been for you," she told Helena gratefully, the day of her wedding.

"You'd never have known me if it hadn't been for the truth I told you," Helena retorted. "And now that you're going to be a minister's wife, you'll be gladder than ever that you know it!"

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

(©, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

The Romance of Shop Talk

"It's simply awful," a young woman writes to me. "I don't know how I'm going to stand it. From the time my husband comes into the house until he goes to sleep, from the moment that he opens his eyes in the morning until he kisses me good-by, all I hear is shop talk—business, business, business! When we go out or have guests he immediately engages them in shop talk, as he does me on our long walks or when we are together. It's the only subject in which he is interested. The books and magazines he reads are those related to his business; the only recreation he cares about is meeting people with whom he can discuss it.

"I must say, of course, that he is making good, having built up, in the two years we have been married, a very promising organization, all entirely without assistance from any one. It is not his talking about his work that I object to, but his excluding any other interest. I worked hard before my marriage, and now I want to enjoy life, and I want my husband to enjoy it. How can I prevent my husband from becoming a money-making machine?"

We quote the letter because the subject is one that will come home to a good many young women. This is our answer to the little lady:

How can you prevent your husband from becoming a money-making machine? One way, of course, is to make him a harassed money loser—a failure. How would you like to have a nice, companionable husband who would never obtrude shop talk and be always ready to play, with the sole fault that he would not be much of a success, that you would have to dodge bill collectors and be shabby and stingy, and later, when you have children, deny them the advantages they should have? How would you like to have a husband who could not look people in the face with the knowledge that he owed nothing to any man? How would you like to give up your sense of security that no matter what might happen he has provided for you? How would you like to have nothing to look forward to but a struggle to make both ends meet? That is the price that many women have paid for having husbands who liked to play more than they liked to work, who were themselves as eager to "enjoy life" as you would have your husband be.

Did you say something of a happy medium—why can't a man work for success without letting his work absorb all his interest? Because success does not recognize half measures. She is an exacting mistress who will not surrender to a man who would grudgingly dole out his offering to her. He must give himself utterly, he must eat and sleep and talk and think the stuff of his dreams before he can hope to win her. Show me any man who, starting at the bottom, rose to significant achievement, and I will show you one whose work was his life while he was building. It is you now who could learn from him how to really enjoy life by seeing his work from the broader viewpoint, which will bring you his dreams and attune your ears to the romance of shop talk.

Come and Do Me

Come and do me!

That is the cry of any one of uncounted myriads of things.

These things are all some of the world's tasks or of Heaven's dreams. They are things waiting to come into our lives, waiting to be treated by love and labor. Like unborn children they reach out appealing hands to the people of earth.

There are tales that yearn to be told, tales that should be fascinating as fairy stories and clean as the narratives of the Scriptures, stories to make good, glad living.

There are pictures and statues waiting for the artist to see them.

There is music, a child of the skies, yearning for ear parents to give it a home, throbbing in hearts that must hear it cry.

There is social justice, justice to children who toil, to men and women living drab lives in tenements and factories.

There is the friend to be made, the tired mother to be helped, the lonely, homesick woman in the next block, the young girl in the boarding house, fighting alone an all but losing fight in the wilderness of a strange city.

There is the stranger in the pew, the letter to be written, the kindly glance for which some neighbor looks, the gentle thought, unspoken but felt.

Great or tiny, the crowding yearnings of the race, of its dumb friends, of its more than human guardians who inspire to acts of love—all wait the birth of the compassion of men and women. Everywhere each of the myriads implore: Come and do me!

Ancient Wedding Custom

Many years ago in Yorkshire, England, there was a time-honored custom requiring a bride and bridegroom, on leaving the church porch after being wedded, to leap over a bench before going on their way, says Gas Logic. The leap being accomplished, a gun was fired, this often being charged with feathers.

Filipinos Hold Firmly to Belief in Witches

Witchery still continues as a source of trouble in the Philippines and hardly a week passes that the constabulary does not investigate the beating or killing of some person suspected of being a witch.

The Filipino witch, as Charles F. Freeman in the New York Tribune explains, is thought to possess the power to take on the shape of a beast at will and to work evil at a long distance. According to the strength of his magic he can cause a selected victim to become seriously ill or to die, and a credulous native, suffering from some malady which he does not understand, believes he has been bewitched.

Sometimes a witch doctor, exasperated by bad luck, will designate a man or woman as being the guilty "mankukulam," and the innocent suspect falls a victim to mob violence.

Unbreakable Ax

With head and handle of steel, forged and tempered in one piece, a handy new ax is by its very construction, unbreakable, says the Popular Science Monthly. The handle cannot work loose and come out, so there is no danger of the head's flying off. A hand-hold of leather gives a firm grip, and the hand does not come in touch with the cold steel. This steel ax is said to be lighter in weight than the usual wooden-handled ax.

Two unusual features of this sturdy ax are a hook on the head that is useful for drawing out staples, and a claw at the end of the handle for pulling nails. Its head, of course, can be used for hammering.

Stunned Fish With Clubs

Caddies at the Napoleon (Ohio) Golf club enjoyed a fish fry recently. The recent heavy rains had backed the water from the river into the creek in the golf grounds, says the Toledo Blade. With the water came an abundance of carp. Caddies armed themselves with golf clubs and drove at the carp until they were stunned and then they were taken home ready for the frying pan.

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

ON HOUSEHOLD BUDGETS

"Aunt Emmy," asked Helen, "won't you explain what is meant by a household budget? You said something the other day about budgets, but I don't seem clear in my mind about it."

"A budget is simply a plan," said Aunt Emmy. "You plan what you are going to do with your income. You divide your income systematically so that you can meet your needs. You lay aside a part of your income for rent, other parts for food, clothing, heat, light, telephone, recreation, savings and so on."

"How are you going to know how much you should spend for each thing—on rent for instance, Aunty?" asked Helen.

"Experts have studied the question carefully and have worked out budgets to suit every income. Of course, you can alter these typical budgets slightly to suit your particular needs. For example, the average budget that covers incomes of from $2,000 to $10,000 a year divides your income into six parts. Ten per cent for savings, twenty per cent for rent, twenty per cent for food, twenty per cent for what is called betterment and includes education, amusement, entertainment, books, music, sports; fifteen per cent for clothes and fifteen per cent for operating expenses.

"No matter how you change the other items you must not change the savings allowance—except to increase it. A great majority of men who reach sixty are dependent on relatives or charity. If they had saved only ten cents out of every dollar, they would not have been in that plight. There is nothing like money in the savings bank to help you through the emergencies that come in everybody's life. If everybody kept one year's income in the savings bank, much misery would be averted. If you always have enough money to see you through one year, you are pretty safe. Beyond that, it is wise to let your money accumulate until you have enough to buy some good securities. Your banker will advise you about the securities that suit your needs."

"But, Aunt Emmy, suppose you wanted to alter your budget?" inquired Helen. "How would you know how to do it? A young married couple might start on a certain budget and then, when they had children to feed and educate, they might want to change it."

"Well, my dear, if they were in doubt about their financial affairs, they could always consult their banker. That is why it is so good to establish friendly relations with a bank when you start out in life. Any banker will be glad to advise young people about making their money go farther."

MINNESOTA STATE FAIR TO OFFER BIG PREMIUMS

Large Attendance and Record - Breaking Shows Assured.

The Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Dairy Exposition, September 4 to 11, is offering $145,839.50 in premiums for educational exhibits, which is considerably more than the total prizes presented by any other state fair or exposition in the world this year.

Since agriculture and livestock raising are our two greatest Northwest industries, the premiums for livestock, agriculture, horticulture, and allied exhibits, are unusually large. Cattle are given $28,786.00; agriculture, $20,583.00; horses, $20,530.00; horticulture, $7,756.00; swine, $8,170; sheep, goats, and wool, $5,052; and poultry, $3,551.

Premiums to boys' and girls' clubs will be $20,011.50. The balance of the prizes will go to the dairy, speed, bee culture, fine arts, and women's departments.

The liberal prizes offered for all kinds of exhibits insure such splendid displays and large attendance that exhibitors from all parts of the country are entering this year, and record-breaking shows are assured.

W. C. T. U. Has Annual Meeting

The local W. C. T. U. held their annual meeting at the home of Mrs. M. O. Mattson on Monday afternoon August 2. A large crowd was in attendance. Mother and Son On Bicycle Trip

Mrs. A. O'Brien and her 9-year-old son stopped here one day last week on their way from Kansas City to Winnipeg by bicycle. The two had pumped the wheel from Kansas City since July 8. They carried with them a pup tent in which they slept.

Why Go To Church?

Because the church is the mightiest agency on earth for the realization of human progress.

It is the efficient advocate and ally of every great reform of our day.

It stands for the highest thinking and most sacrificial doing.

It presents the noblest ideals of life, and points the way to their realization.

It furnishes the motive and incentive for the expression of sympathy and compassion.

It is the supreme character making institution of the world.

It is the only organization under the sun doing business for God exclusively.

It is the divinely appointed and accredited agency for the realization of the kingdom of God on earth.

It is the avenue thru which men and women walk up to the heights of God.

In its advocacy of civil and social righteousness it does more than all other organizations or institutions combined to make crime difficult and virtue easy.

Farm Spark Plugs

Save the straw. It will help to take the place of hay this fall and winter.

Hay will be short in quantity and high in price this winter. What are you doing to provide forage for your livestock?

A trench silo, if your soil is heavy enough and well drained, may give you the means of storing roughage for winter feeding if hay is scarce.

Advertising Did It.

One of the finest bits of evidence as to the value of advertising that has come to our notice recen was presented to an audience of several hundred Minnesota dairy farmers at the recent annual meeting of the Minnesota Co-operative Creameries association, now Land o' Lakes, Inc., at its new building in Minneapolis.

The salesmanager of the creameries association was telling members how he had introduced Land o' Lakes butter to Cleveland, Ohio. He had induced Fisher Bros., owners of a chain of groceries in Cleveland, to include Land o' Lakes butter in their stocks. The firm believed in advertising. it announced to its patrons of Clevelank in full page ads on a certain Sunday morning that it would place a full carload —30,000 pounds— of Land o' Lakes butter on sale the following morning.

What happened?

That carload of butter was sold to the last pound before 10 o' clock Monday morning.

Mica Unearthed on Farm in Bloomer

While digging a water pond on his farm in Bloomer township this week, Hiemer Dahlin unearthed a small quantity of mica at a depht of twelve feet. Samples of the mineral were brought to Argyle and exhibited. The mica is clear and transparent. Thru a piece half an inch thick newspaper print can be distinctly read and with a knife it can be shaved in thin smooth leaves. It is believed the mineral was carried from a distant source and deposited there centuries ago by a glacier.

Weak Demand Seen For Harvest Labor

A weak demand with an average supply of farm help available for harvest, is shown by a servey made by the Minnesota Farm Bureau for July.

The reports at present do not indicate a demand sufficient to warrent asking the railroads for special harvest rates this year. Crop conditions have much to do with labor situation.

The Farm Bureau's survey shows the average day wage for harvest and haying to be $2.55 and the monthly average $55, being very little different from the average wage prevailisg a year ago for this class of labor.

Sawmill Burned At Northwest Angle

Johnson's sawmill at Northwest Angle was totally destroyed by fire on Tuesday. The cause of the fire is unknown. It was quite a large mill, and as there was no insurance the loss to the owner will be heavy.

News of the fire was received in Baudette over John Gjelhaugs radio, and was broadcasted by Fred Peterson at Oak Island.

Figured Out Method Of Saving Space

S. M. Rector of the Deer Creek Mirror believes that he has discovered "the why" of the modern dance.

We are not going to dispute S. M.'s perfectly good reason for his beliefs, for maybe 'tis so. He says: "It is in line of progress and just as necessary as for the farmer to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before." Just as the latter is necessary to supply the increase in population so is the former. Two couples can now dance where one danced before."

79 FAIL TO PAY AUTO TAX

Amount Owed Is Twice Original Tax.

Seventy-nine automobile owners in Marshall county are listed with Clerk of Court Swandby as delinquint in the payment of their 1926 auto tax. The total amount owed by these delinquints approximates $2100, or twice the amount of the original tax because of penalties. Warrants for the arrest of all such auto owners included in the list who have not paid their indebtedness prior to July 31, will be issued by Clerk Swandby for service by the sheriff's office, which is empowered by law to collect these delinquint taxes as well as to levy on any personal property held by car owners for the payment thereof.

The man's hatred was different from the beast's, but perhaps even more implacable. With McTaggart it was not hatred alone. There was mixed with it an indefinable and superstitious fear, a thing he laughed at, a thing he cursed at, but which clung to him as surely as the scent of his trail clung to Baree's nose. Baree no longer stood for the animal alone; he stood for Nepeese. That was the thought that insisted in growing in McTaggart's ugly mind. He had not ceased to hate Baree; he still hated him as he had never hated a man, but he had an even greater reason now for wanting to kill him. It came to him first in his sleep, in a restless dream, and after that it lived, and lived—the thought that the spirit of Nepeese was guiding Baree in the ravaging of his trap-line!

It was in January that McTaggart caught his first glimpse of Baree. He had placed his rifle against a tree, and was a dozen feet away from it at the time. It was as if Baree knew, and had come to taunt him; for when the Factor suddenly looked up Baree was standing out clear from the dwarf spruce not twenty yards away from him, his white fangs gleaming and his eyes burning like coals. For a space McTaggart stared as if turned into stone. It was Baree. He recognized the white star, the white-tipped ear, and his heart thumped like a hammer in his breast. Very slowly he began to creep toward his rifle. His hand was reaching for it when like a flash Baree was gone.

This gave McTaggart his new idea. He blazed himself a fresh trail through the forests parallel with his trap-line but at least five hundred yards distant from it. Wherever a trap or deadfall was set this new trail struck sharply in, like the point of a V, so that he could approach his line unobserved. By this strategy he believed that in time he was sure of getting a shot at the dog. Again it was the man who was reasoning, and again it was the man who was defeated. The first day that McTaggart followed his new trail Baree also struck that trail. For a little while it puzzled him. Three times he cut back and forth between the old and the new trail. Then there was no doubt. The new trail was the fresh trail, and he followed in the footsteps of the Factor from Lac Bain. McTaggart did not know what was happening until his return trip, when he saw the story told in the snow. Baree had visited each trap, and without exception he had approached each time at the point of the inverted V. After a week of futile hunting, of lying in wait, of approaching at every point of the wind—a period during which McTaggart had twenty times cursed himself into fits of madness, another idea came to him. It was like an inspiration, and so simple that it seemed almost inconceivable that he had not thought of it before.

He hurried back to Post Lac Bain. The second day after he was on the trail at dawn. This time he carried a pack in which there were a dozen strong wolf traps freshly dipped in beaver oil, and a rabbit which he had snared the previous night. Now and then he looked anxiously at the sky. It was clear until late in the afternoon, when banks of dark clouds began rolling up from the east. Half an hour later a few flakes of snow began falling. McTaggart let one of these drop on the back of his mittened hand, and examined it closely. It was soft and downy, and he gave vent to his satisfaction. It was what he wanted. Before morning there would be six inches of freshly fallen snow covering the trails.

He stopped at the next trap-house and quickly set to work. First he threw away the poisoned bait in the "house" and replaced it with the rabbit. Then he began setting his wolf traps. Three of these he placed close to the "door" of the house, through which Baree would have to reach for the bait. The remaining nine he scattered at intervals of a foot or sixteen inches apart, so that when he was done a veritable cordon of traps guarded the house. He did not fasten the chains, but let them lay loose in the snow. If Baree got into one trap he would get into others and there would be no use of toggles. His work done, McTaggart hurried on through the thickening twilight of winter night to his shack. He was highly elated. This time there could be no such thing as failure. He had sprung every trap on his way from Lac Bain. In none of those traps would Baree find anything to eat until he came to the "nest" of twelve wolf traps.

Seven inches of snow fell that night, and the whole world seemed turned into a wonderful white robe. Like billows of feathers the snow hung to the trees and shrubs; it gave tall white caps to the rocks, and underfoot it was so light that a cartridge dropped from the hand sank to the bottom of it. Baree was on the trap-line early. He was more cautious this morning, for there was no longer the scent or snowshoe track of McTaggart to guide him. He struck the first trap about halfway between Lac Bain and the shack in which the Factor was waiting. It was sprung, and there was no bait. Trap after trap he visited, and all of them he found sprung, and all without bait. He sniffed the air suspiciously, striving vainly to catch the tang of smoke, a whiff of the man-smell. Along toward noon he came to the "nest"—the twelve treacherous traps waiting for him with gaping jaws half a foot under the blanket of snow. For a full minute he stood well outside the danger line, sniffing the air, and listening. He saw the rabbit, and his jaws closed with a hungry click. He moved a step nearer. Still he was suspicious—for some strange and inexplicable reason he sensed danger. Anxiously he sought for it with his nose, his eyes, and his ears. And all about him there was a great silence and a great peace. His jaws clicked again. He whined softly. What was it stirring him? Where was the danger he could neither see nor smell? Slowly he circled about the trap-house; three times he circled round it, each circle drawing him a little nearer—until at last his feet almost touched the outer cordon of traps. Another minute he stood still; his ears flattened; in spite of the rich aroma of the rabbit in his nostrils something was drawing him away. In another moment he would have gone, but there came suddenly—and from directly behind the trap-house—a fierce little rat-like squeak, and the next instant Baree saw an ermine whiter than the snow tearing hungrily at the flesh of the rabbit. He forgot his strange premonition of danger. He growled fiercely, but his plucky little rival did not budge from his feast.

And then he sprang straight into the "nest" that Bush McTaggart had made for him. * * * * * *

The next morning Bush McTaggart heard the clanking of a chain when he was still a good quarter of a mile from the "nest." Was it a lynx? Was it a fisher-cat? Was it a wolf or a fox? Or was it Baree? He half ran the rest of the distance, and at last he came to where he could see, and his heart leaped into his throat when he saw that he had caught his enemy. He approached, holding is rifle ready to fire if by any chance the dog should free himself.

Baree lay on his side, panting from exhaustion and quivering with pain. A hoarse cry of exultation burst from McTaggart's lips as he drew nearer and looked at the snow. It was packed hard for many feet about the trap-house, where Baree had struggled, and it was red with blood. The blood had come mostly from Baree's jaws. They were dripping now as he glared at his enemy. The steel jaws hidden under the snow had done their merciless work well. One of his forefeet was caught well up toward the first joint; both hind feet were caught; a fourth trap had closed on his flank, and in tearing the jaws loose he had pulled off a patch of skin half as big as McTaggart's hand. The snow told the story of his desperate fight all through the night; his bleeding jaws showed how vainly he had tried to break the imprisoning steel with his teeth. He was panting. His eyes were bloodshot. But even now, after all his hours of agony, neither his spirit nor his courage were broken. When he saw McTaggart he made a lunge to his feet, almost instantly crumpling down into the snow again. But his forefeet were braced. His head and chest remained up, and the snarl that came from his throat was tigerish in its ferocity. Here, at last—not more than a dozen feet from him—was the one thing in all the world that he hated more than he hated the wolf breed. And again he was helpless, as he had been helpless that other time in the rabbit snare.

The fierceness of his snarl did not disturb Bush McTaggart now. He saw how utterly the other was at his mercy, and with an exultant laugh he leaned his rifle against a tree, pulled off his mittens, and began loading his pipe. This was the triumph he had looked forward to, the torture he had waited for. In his soul there was a hatred as deadly as Baree's, the hatred that a man might have for a man. He had expected to send a bullet through the dog. But this was better—to watch him dying by inches, to taunt him as he would have taunted a human, to walk about him so that he could hear the clank of the traps and see the fresh blood drip as Baree twisted his tortured legs and body to keep facing him. It was a splendid vengeance. He was so engrossed in it that he did not hear the approach of snowshoes behind him. It was a voice—a man's voice—that turned him round suddenly.

The man was a stranger, and he was younger than McTaggart by ten years. At least he looked no more than thirty-five or six, even with the short growth of blonde beard he wore. He was of that sort that the average man would like at a glance; boyish, and yet a man; with clear eyes that looked out frankly from under the rim of his fur cap, a form lithe as an Indian's, and a face altogether that did not bear the hard lines of the wilderness. Yet McTaggart knew before he had spoken that this man was of the wilderness, that he was heart and soul a part of it. His cap was of fisher-skin. He wore a windproof coat of softly tanned caribou skin, belted at the waist with a long sash, and Indian fringed. The inside of the coat was furred. He was traveling on the long, slender bush-country snowshoe; his pack, strapped over the shoulders, was small and compact; he was carrying his rifle in a cloth jacket. And from cap to snowshoes he was travel-worn. McTaggart, at a guess, would have said that he had traveled a thousand miles in the last few weeks. It was not this thought that sent the strange and chilling thrill up his back; but the sudden fear that in some strange way a whisper of the truth might have found its way down into the south—the truth of what had happened on the Gray Loon—and that this travel-worn stranger wore under his caribou-skin coat the badge of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. For that instant it was almost a terror that possessed him, and he stood mute.

The stranger had uttered only an amazed exclamation before. Now he said, with his eyes on Baree:

"God save us, but you've got the poor devil in a right proper mess, haven't you?"

There was something in the voice that reassured McTaggart. It was not a suspicious voice, and he saw that the stranger was more interested in the captured animal than in himself. He drew a deep breath.

"A trap robber," he said.

The stranger was staring still more closely at Baree. He thrust his gun stock downward in the snow and drew nearer to him.

"God save us again—a dog!" he exclaimed.

From behind, McTaggart was watching the man with the eyes of a ferret.

"Yes, a dog," he answered. "A wild dog, half wolf at least. He's robbed me of a thousand dollars' worth of fur this winter."

The stranger squatted himself before Baree, with his mittened hands resting on his knees, and his white teeth gleaming in a half smile.

"You poor devil!" he said sympathetically. "So you're a trap robber, eh? An outlaw? And—the Police have got you! And—God save us once more—they haven't played you a very square game!"

He rose and faced McTaggart.

"I had to set a lot of traps like that," the Factor apologized, his face reddening slightly under the steady gaze of the stranger's blue eyes. Suddenly his animus rose. "And he's going to die there, inch by inch. I'm going to let him starve, and rot in the traps, to pay for all he's done." He picked up his gun, and added, with his eyes on the stranger and his finger ready at the trigger, "I'm Bush McTaggart, the Factor at Lac Bain. Are you bound that way, m'sieu?"

"A few miles. I'm bound up-country—beyond the Barrens."

McTaggart felt again the strange thrill.

"Government?" he asked.

The stranger nodded.

"The—Police, perhaps," persisted McTaggart.

"Why, yes—of course—the Police," said the stranger, looking straight into the Factor's eyes. "And now, m'sieu, as a very great courtesy to the Law I'm going to ask you to send a bullet through that beast's head before we go on. Or shall I?"

"It's the law of the line," said McTaggart, "to let a trap robber rot in the traps. And that beast was a devil. Listen——"

Swiftly, and yet leaving out none of the fine detail, he told of the weeks and months of strife between himself and Baree; of the maddening futility of all his tricks and schemes and the still more maddening cleverness of the beast he had at last succeeded in trapping.

"He was a devil—that clever," he cried fiercely when he had finished. "And now—would you shoot him, or let him lie there and die by inches, as the devil should?"

Revenged

A busy housewife came into the sitting room, a determined look in her eyes.

"I shall have to punish those children," she began.

"What have the little beggars been up to now?" asked father, looking up from his newspaper.

"Why, they've made a mess of my sewing room," explained his wife. "Needles, reels of cotton, scissors—everything had been hidden away in the most unexpected places. It's exasperating."

Her husband laid down his paper and smiled.

"I did that," he said calmly. "You tidied up my desk so beautifully the other day that I thought it only fair to return the compliment. So I tidied up your sewing-room."

STOPS TO RESCUE MEN IN DISTRESS; JAIL HIS REWARD

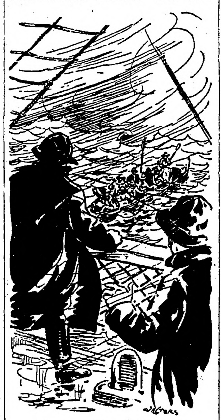
Rum Runner, Chased by Coast Guard, Couldn't Pass Up Lost Sailors.

Portland, Ore.—A sentence of two years in prison and a fine of $5,000 is the reward that heroism has brought Capt. Robert Pamphlet, commander of a rum running schooner, in court here. Captain Pamphlet, being chased by a coast guard cutter, stopped long enough to rescue nine men in an open boat on the Pacific.

Captain Pamphlet's schooner was escaping in a raging storm when its lookout spied Captain Sandvig of a disabled ship and eight men in an open boat, and the nine men were taken aboard. By that time the cutter had caught up, though, and the rum runner was seized.

Captain Sentenced.

During his trial Captain Pamphlet asserted that he was 18 miles at sea when he was arrested. The coast guardsmen said it was seven miles. The captain was convicted and sentenced, but he has appealed to a higher court.



The Rum Runner Hove To.

"They may be rum runners, but they are men," is the tribute of Captain Sandvig to his rescuers. "They gave us their food, their clothing, their bunks, and their booze. A big freighter refused to help us, but the rum runner picked us up—and was seized as a result."

Driver Misplaces His Fifty-Passenger Bus

New York.—William O'Donnell of Bridgeport, Conn., would be no man to be intrusted with an elephant. O'Donnell lost his 50-passenger sightseeing bus in New York and tramped the streets for half an hour until he found it parked in front of a police station.

After driving 40 members of the Court Marina lodge of Foresters from Bridgeport to Coney Island, O'Donnell left his bus at the curb while he visited friends.

Neighborhood children climbed aboard. One started it, and away went the bus. Then Patrolman John Koch hove into sight. With the cry, "Cheesit, the cop!" the self-elected sightseers jumped from the bus and ran.

Koch took the machine to the station. An hour later O'Donnell started for Coney to pick up the Foresters for the trip back to Bridgeport.

Bans Tucked Shirt on Girls' Bathing Suits

New York.—Among the costumes the smart girl will not wear this summer at Coney Island, if she follows the advice of Magistrate Fowell, is the snappy, two-piece bathing suit with the multicolored belt and the shirt tucked inside the trunks.

The two-piece suit may be worn, Magistrate Fowell explained to ten none too penitent bathers, only if one interferes with the stream lines of the costume and keeps the shirt outside. A municipal ordinance states definitely, the magistrate said, that the upper garment may not, under any circumstances, be tucked into the lower garment.

Son Kills His Father in Duel at Milwaukee

Milwaukee.—Father and son fought a shotgun duel here in which Joseph D. Owen, sixty-two, was killed. Harold Owens, thirty-three, son and business associate of Joseph, admitted to police he fired two charges of buckshot at his father following a quarrel between his parents. The duel was a culmination of many weeks of discord caused, according to the story sobbed out by the son to police, by his father's abuse of his mother. The younger Owens was held by police.

Dream Causes Death

Greenville, S. C.—When some one in a dream shouted "fire," the cry caused the death of Jack Extine. He leaped from the second floor of a hotel to escape the flames. He was fatally injured.

He Was No Longer Useful

By CLARISSA MACKIE

(Copyright.)

IT WAS the day after the fire, and Peggy Latimer sat forlornly on the one chair which was not scorched, charred or burned to charred fragments.

"Well, Peggy, it's a merciful thing that you escaped with your life," said old Mrs. Benton, as she leaned over the fence that divided her small home from what had been for years known as "the Latimer place." There had been a house, where the Latimers had lived for years, generation after generation—and now the house which had been a home for so many years was nothing except a heap of smoking cinders, and nearby sat Peggy, the last of the line. After her mother's death, she had kept on teaching school, living in the old house alone except for old Penelope Beers, who made her home there.

"I know it seems wonderful not to lose my life, Mrs. Benton," said Peggy in reply to the old lady's remark, "but you know that I cannot find an insurance policy, though I was sure the house was insured with Ben Hawkes, for five years—that was three years ago, and Ben declares that it was for only three years and has expired."

"Humph!" ejaculated Mrs. Benton, "if you hadn't given Ben Hawkes the mitten last winter, Peggy, he'd have a better memory, I'm thinking!"

"We will believe the best of Ben," said Peggy firmly, and just then there was a sound of a small car which stopped before the Latimer gate and out of which emerged a tall, slim, dapper young man carrying a brief case.

"Is it Ben Hawkes?" whispered Mrs. Benton shrilly.

"I don't know who it is—a stranger."

The dapper young man advanced and bowed politely.

"I am selling fire insurance," he said briskly.

"Why didn't you come last week?" inquired Peggy.

"I did come, then!" was the amazing answer.

"I don't remember," the girl said, puzzled.

"I remember distinctly," said the man. "Were you insured, madame?" he asked Peggy.

She told him about the insurance policy which, if it really existed, had been destroyed.

"Hum," he said thoughtfully, "I remember some one opened the door when I knocked, and you answered through a crack of the door, 'No, sir, we don't want any fire insurance, life insurance, vacuum cleaners, washing machines, brooms, brushes, horseradish, painkiller, silver polish, magazine subscriptions or nothing!'"

"But I never said any such thing to you or anyone else," denied Peggy indignantly. "It must have been Penelope!"

"Here comes Ben Hawkes, now," said Mrs. Benton excitedly. "You ask him about the policy once more, Peggy!"

Ben Hawkes came, lifting his straw hat from a very rich shock of auburn hair, and smiling broadly. "Good morning, Peggy, still surveying the ruins?"

"Yes," said Peggy.

"Excuse me, Mr. Hawkes—your name's Hawkes, isn't it?" asked the strange young man. "My name's Buttons, Theodore Buttons—I'm inquiring about the Latimer place—as I understand it, you're disputing the payment of the fire insurance."

"Disputing nothing," denied Ben, growing darkly red. "I'm not paying insurance when policies have run out and not been renewed. No, sir, I don't do business that way!"

"I take exception to that," said the other. "You see, Mr. Hawkes, I happen to be vice president of the BLX Fire Insurance company of Philadelphia, of which you were formerly the agent."

"Formerly—what do you mean?" blustered Ben.

"Until ten minutes ago you were—I have canceled your agency—don't like the way you conduct business, sir! You sent in a report three years ago, showing that Mrs. Latimer took out a five years' policy for two thousand dollars covering her house and barn here—premiums are all paid to date, and house burned last night—policy has two years to run—get me? Understand why you are no longer useful as our agent?"

Days passed, the insurance was paid, and a new house lifted its walls on the Latimer lot. Mr. Buttons found occasion to make frequent calls there, to view the house and its progress, and to see Peggy, who grew more blooming every day as her liking flowered into love. The day she accepted Teddy Buttons, they decided to keep the Latimer place as a little country home and live in the city.

"Now, we will have this Penelope girl who chased me away the first time," said Teddy in his masterful way. "Surely it is fair to Penelope to give her a home and live as housekeeper in return for being the one who really blew the flame of love out of the cinders of this old house!"

"But the house had not burned then," laughed Peggy.

He waved her airily aside. "My love, facts have nothing to do with the creating of a beautiful romance like ours."

"Excepting—" breathed Peggy. "Excepting one fact—"

"Our true love," said Teddy, soberly.

WOMAN CONQUERS FEARS

Husband Delighted and Home Happier

St. Paul, Minn.—"Here is a little advice I would like to have you put in the papers," Mrs. Jack Lorberter of 704 Dellwood Place wrote to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company. "If young women want to keep their health and strength for the next thirty years of their lives, it is best to start in right now and take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I have tried the Compound myself and received fine results from its use." In describing her condition before taking the Compound, she writes, "I was afraid in my own house in broad daylight, I used to lock the doors and pull down the shades so that nobody could see me." One day a booklet advertising the Vegetable Compound was left on her porch and she read it through. In so doing, she found a letter from a woman whose condition was similar to her own. "I bought Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound," Mrs. Lorberter continued, "and have had fine results. My condition made me a burden to my husband. Now I ask him, "How is housekeeping?" and he says, "It is just like being in Heaven!" Are you on the Sunlit Road to Better Health?

DOLORES AND HER LOVE

By J. B. GRANT

(© by W. G. Chapman.)

DOLORES GARCIA sat on the step of her adobe hut and looked out across the hills. Her slim, brown hands were clasped tightly in those of Dick Chapin the manager of the Oswego mine. Dick was only twenty-four, but his father had the controlling interest in the property. Dick had been sent to Mexico to keep him out of just such scrapes as that into which he was now running.

"So you see, Dolores, we will be married next week," Dick was saying, "and I will take you back to New York with me. The old man? Well, he will kick, of course, but he'll soon quiet down. Nobody could see you without falling in love with you."

Dolores was seventeen, which is a marriageable age for a Mexican girl with Indian blood in her veins. At least Pedro, the foreman, thought so. He had handled his knife for several days past whenever he saw Dick riding past. Pedro and Dolores had been sweethearts once; but Pedro's lovemaking was not like Dick's.

"Will you marry me?" Dick asked for the twentieth time. And for the first time Dolores answered "yes."

She turned and kissed him on the lips and fled into her hut, while Dick rode home in the moonlight, smiling foolishly and dreaming, as youth will.

He did not see the gun that Pedro leveled at him as he rode past the foreman's house. Pedro's finger trembled on the trigger. But while he hesitated Dick rode out of gunshot range.

"Dolores," said her wrinkled old mother, that evening, "the Gringo loves thee, eh?"

Dolores nodded. She was wiser than Dick, though her years were fewer. "He will take me to New York," she said. "His father is rich. He has a castle there."

"Listen to me, child!" exclaimed the older woman, beating her breast passionately. "Before thy father courted me I had a Gringo lover. Thou hadst not known that? Would I had not, too, for the first love is the strongest, and even now, wrinkled as I am, and withered, my heart is his. Can the white mate with the brown? Thou wilt come back sadly, and Pedro will laugh at thee."

Dolores cried herself to sleep that night. Dick's love seemed to be eternal! yet she had heard other women speak as her mother had spoken.

Pedro was glad that he had withheld his hand that night. On the following morning there came a rumbling sound among the masses of rock that overhung the executive offices of the mine. The whole mass slipped from its anchorage and toppled down upon the buildings. Three men were in them at the time. Two were never found. One was carried out, crushed and mangled. That one was Dick.

"There is one chance in a dozen," said the mine doctor, after examining him. "He must be kept absolutely quiet, and his father had better be notified to start for Mexico at once."

They telegraphed to Dick's father, but to keep him quiet was not so easy. All day and night in his delirium he called for Dolores. To pacify him, they sent for her. Upon the doctor's supervision she glided in and out, her presence only bringing momentary rest to the sick man's tortured frame.

Pedro was not so glad then. He wished now that he had used his gun that night.

The crisis came on the third day. The doctor had repaired the shattered framework of the body, but he could do no more for Dick. Life and death were fighting that afternoon for Dick Chapin. He lay in a stupor upon his bed, occasionally opening his eyes and muttering Dolores' name.

The doctor was gone away. "I will be back at nightfall," he had said. "There will be no change till then."

Dolores had just finished soaking a bandage when she looked up to see Pedro standing in the doorway. He had not spoken to her for weeks, not since the week after Dick's arrival, in fact.

"You love the Gringo, hey?" he demanded.

Dolores flashed out at him:

"That is my business, Pedro. I have said 'no' to you. Why do you come creeping in here when nobody is about? That is like you, to torment me. You are a coward, Pedro."

"Say what you like," said Pedro, shrugging his shoulders. "His sweetheart comes from America this evening."

"You lie, Pedro," answered the girl.

Pedro grinned and held out a copy of a Texas newspaper. Neither of them could read Spanish, let alone English, but photographs speak the same tongue in every land. It was impossible to mistake that of Dick Chapin or that of the girl in the same picture, about whose waist Dick's arm was resting.

Dolores looked at it and grew pale as death.

"He may have broken it off, Pedro," she gasped.

"Well," said Pedro, philosophically, "that remains to be seen. I say that she will come this evening, with his mother. Such is the story in the mine."

The mother's words came back to Dolores. Pedro saw the indecision in her face.

"Will you be shamed by a Gringo woman when the way lies open, Dolores?" he asked. "Remember, I love you. I know the Gringo makes fine promises to women, but he is not your kind. He will never marry you."

"Come here, Pedro," whispered the girl. She drew him outside. A moment later Pedro walked away grinning. As he left her Dolores heard Dick's call for her. She hurried back. Dick's eyes were wide open, and he recognized her again. The crisis was past.

"Dolores!" he whispered, drawing her toward him.

"Dick," she said, "thy—thy mother comes this night."

"My mother!" he exclaimed. "How long have I been ill, then? What happened? Ah! The landslide!" Memory was returning, and with it came the solution of the crisis.

"He will live now," said the doctor when he returned. "I'm glad that the crisis ended before his mother came."

The night train brought Mrs. Chapin and a young woman. Dolores, cast out from the sickroom now, watched them in bitterness of soul as, with hurried steps, they hastened toward the mine hospital.

"If he returns her kiss," she said to herself, "I shall know."

She followed them, gradually gaining upon them, until she reached the door of the sick man's room, a few paces behind. Neither of the women paid any attention to the Indian girl; she was not even seen by them. Dolores stood at the door and watched.

With a cry Mrs. Chapin sprang to the bedside and flung her arms about her boy. And then, while they still clung together, the younger woman drew near. Her tears fell on Dick's face. His arms were round her, too.

Dolores crept away. Pedro drew near her, but she ran from him. She could not see him yet. She had one more duty to do. She went to the doctor's office.

"Senor," she gasped, "tell me one thing faithfully. You said that he would live. Will he live to stand upon his feet again, like a man, or will he only crawl in the sun?"

"God bless you, my child, of course he will stand on his feet again," the doctor answered, looking at her curiously. He was not too ignorant of Dick's flirtation with her, and, knowing the ways of Mexico, had not been greatly disturbed by it. Dick could look after himself. And the girl—he understood that love was only an episode in these girls' lives. Still, her tone moved him.

"Why do you ask me?" he inquired, curiously.

"I have heard," said Dolores, "that when a Gringo is crippled his sweetheart leaves him. The Gringo women do not love as we love."

"Oh, I guess most women are alike," replied the doctor, carelessly. "But don't be distressed about him. Dick Chapin will be as fit as ever he was in a few weeks."

"Thank you," replied Dolores, listlessly, and went away.

"Who is that 'Dolores' that Dick is all the time asking for?" inquired Mrs. Chapin of the doctor.

"Oh, just a native woman who nursed him," the doctor answered. "She left here suddenly last night with a fellow named Pedro. Married? Let's hope so; but marriage doesn't count for very much among these Mexicans."

"I'm glad she's gone," said Mrs. Chapin. "Dick's sister and I were rather worried to know who she could be."

"I think there was a little tenderness on both sides," answered the doctor. "Best say nothing about her, and I'll break the news to him tomorrow morning."

Gangster Surely Gave Judge Uneasy Moment

A noted Chicago criminal judge, alone in his office, heard a noise and looked up to meet the menacing gaze of one of the city's most daring criminals, who had slipped in unawares, says Capper's Weekly. The judge thought his time had come, especially when the crook reached into his hip pocket and began fumbling for something.

Six months before the judge had refused a parole for this man, known as "Jimmy the Fence." "You here?" stammered the judge. "Yes," answered Jimmy, "I told you I was comin' when I got out." But, when the man took his hand from his pocket there was no gun in it. Instead, he handed the judge a piece of folded paper. On it the judge read a declaration made by Jimmy to his wife. He had obtained a job in a lumber yard and sworn he would go straight forever.

"You see, judge," Jimmy began, "it was during that six months Jimmy Jr. was born. My wife pleaded with me to lay off the underhanded stuff so we could give little Jimmy the education neither of us had. And say, judge, you ought to see him—nine pounds to the ounce and kickin' just like his dad."

The judge congratulated Jimmy Sr. and then shook hands with himself."

Only Unchanged Cabinet

The cabinet of President Pierce was the only cabinet in the history of the United States which remained unchanged throughout the four-year term. It was composed of William L. Marcey (N. Y.), secretary of state; Jefferson Davis (Miss.), secretary of war; James Guthrie (Ky.), secretary of the treasury; James C. Dobbin (N. C.), secretary of the navy; Robert McClelland (Mich.), secretary of the interior; James Campbell (Pa.), postmaster-general, and Caleb Cushing, (Mass.), attorney-general.—Exchange.

STATE OF MINNESOTA IN DISERICT COURT
COUNTY OF MARSHALL, FOURTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

IN THE MATTER OF THE DISSOLUTION OF THE HOLT FARMERS ELEVATOR COMPANY, A CORPORATION.

The Holt Farmers Elevator Company, a Corporation, having presented to the District Court of the County of Marshall, the County of the principal place of business of said Corporation, a petition setting forth the name of the Corporation, when and by or under what law it was Incorporated, the names and addresses of the bond holders, stockholders, and members, the amount of the authorized capital stock, the amount of the capital stock actually paid in, that said Corporation is not now actually doing business, but that it ceased about June 10th, 1926; and setting forth the amount of the indebtedness of said Corporation and the amount and character of its personal property and the amount and description of its real estate; and setting forth that said Corporation is insolvent and unable to pay its indebtedness, or to resume and continue business, and praying that said Corporation be dissolved and a Receiver appointed to wind up its affairs; and praying that a time and place of hearing on said petition be fixed and notice be given according to law.

NOW, THEREFORE, The Court being fully advised, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, That said petition be filed and that Monday, the 30th day of August, 1926, at ten o'clock A. M., in the Marshall County Court House, in the city of Warren, Marshall County, Minnesota, be and hereby is fixed as the time and place of hearing on said petition. That at such time and place any and all persons may appear and be heard and show cause, if any they have, why such petition should not be granted and such Receiver appointed. Let notice of such time and place of hearing be given by publication of this Order at least three weeks immediately preceding the 30th day of August, 1926, in the Holt Weekly News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Holt, Minnesota, and by mailing a copy of this Order to each of the stockholders of said Corporation, at their last known postoffice address, at least ten days prior to said date of hearing.

Done by the Court, this 31st day of July, 1926.

ANDREW GRINDELAND,
Judge of the District Court.

We Have Invested in the Business of our Customers.

Financing is the most important initial consideration of any new business enterprise. Men with confidence in the future of the business must provide the necessary funds and bring it into being.

In this day of advanced power development, promoters of business need never question whether or not the necessary power will be available when they are ready for it. They know that it will be. They know that the Light and Power Company is daily providing for any expansion demand that may arise.

In order to do this, however, the Power Company must invest considerable money in the customer's enterprise. We are therefore anxious that your business be successful so that we also may realize on our invesment.

The average manufacturer turns over his capital once a year, some more often, and the merchant's turnover is still higher. If manufacturers and merchants were forced to provide their own power needs, their investment would be greatly increased, and the length of time necessary to turn over their capital, materially increased.

Electric Light and Power Companies turn over their capital only about once in five years. They must content themselves with small earnings on their investment.

The Farmer And His Wheat;

An Allegory From The Horton (Kansas) Headlight.

Once a farmer had 1,800 bushels of wheat, which he sold, not to one grain merchant, but to 1,800 different dealers, a bushel to each. A few of them paid cash, but far the greater number said they would pay later.

A few months passed and the man's bank account ran low. "How is this?" he said. "My 1,800 bushels of grain should have kept me in affluence until another crop is raised; but I have parted with my grain and instead I have raised a vast number of accounts so small and scattered that I cannot get around to collect fast enough to pay expenses."

So he posted up a public notice and asked those who owed him to pay quickly. But few came. The rest said, "Mine is only a small matter and I will pay some other day," forgetting that, tho each account was very small, when all was put together it meant a large sum to one man.

Things went on thus. The man got to feeling so bad that he fell out of bed and awoke. Running to his granary, he found his 1,800 bushels of wheat still there.

MORAL: The next day he went to the publisher of his paper and said: "Here, sir, is the pay for your paper, and when next year's subscription is due, you can depend on me to pay it promptly. A GOOD TIP

Now is the time to buy purebred livestock. A considerable volume of purebred stock originally intended for breeding purposes has been going to the block because prices for purebreds in many instances have declined practically to the level of those paid for slaughter animals. There is need for purebred livestock on farms and it does not seem right to slaughter animals that could be used to improve the quality of farm herds and flocks.

An exceptionally high producing cow is worth many times the price of a slaughter animal. Not only does such an individual produce more actual milk and butterfat, but the superior production characteristics of such individuals may be passed on through several succeeding generations.

The fact should not be overlooked that purebred livestock is a real necessity. Without such stock, milk and butterfat records and weights of fleeces will decline and uniformity of type and quality will be sacrificed. No improvement can be made without them. Now is the time to sell scrub stock and buy purebreds while the prices are low.—Banker-Farmer.

The stranger was looking at Baree. His face was turned away from McTaggart. He said:

"I guess you are right. Let the devil rot. If you're heading for Lac Bain, m'sieu, I'll travel a short distance with you now. It will take a couple of miles to straighten out the line of my compass."

He picked up his gun. McTaggart led the way. At the end of half an hour the stranger stopped, and pointed north.

"Straight up there—a good five hundred miles," he said, speaking as lightly as though he would reach home that night. "I'll leave you here."

He made no offer to shake hands. But in going, he said, "You might report that John Madison has passed this way."

After that he traveled straight northward for half a mile through the deep forest. Then he swung westward for two miles, turned at a sharp angle into the south, and an hour after he had left McTaggart he was once more squatted on his heels almost within arms' reach of Baree.

And he was saying, as though speaking to a human companion:

"So that's what you've been, old boy. A trap robber, eh? An outlaw? And you beat him at the game for two months! And for that, because you're a better beast than he is, he wants to let you die here as slow as you can. An outlaw!" His voice broke into a pleasant laugh, the sort of laugh that warms one, even a beast. "That's funny. We ought to shake hands, Boy, by George, we had! You're a wild one, he says. Well, so am I. Told him my name was John Madison. It ain't. I'm Jim Carvel. And, oh Lord!—all I said was 'Police.' And that was right. It ain't a lie. I'm wanted by the whole corporation—by every danged policeman between Hudson's bay and the Mackenzie river. Shake, old man. We're in the same boat, an' I'm glad to meet you!"

Chapter XV

Jim Carvel held out his hand, and the snarl that was in Baree's throat died away. The man rose to his feet. He stood there, looking in the direction taken by Bush McTaggart, and chuckled in a curious, exultant sort of way. There was friendliness even in that chuckle. There was friendliness in his eyes and in the shine of his teeth as he looked again at Baree. About him there was something that seemed to make the gray day brighter, that seemed to warm the chill air—a strange something that radiated cheer and hope and comradeship just as a hot stove sends out the glow of heat. Baree felt it. For the first time since the two men had come his trap-torn body lost its tenseness; his back sagged; his teeth clicked as he shivered in his agony. To this man he betrayed his weakness. In his bloodshot eyes there was a hungering look as he watched Carvel—the self-confessed outlaw. And Jim Carvel again held out his hand—much nearer this time.

"You poor devil," he said, the smile going out of his face. "You poor devil!"

The words were like a caress to Baree—the first he had known since the loss of Nepeese and Pierrot. He dropped his head until his jaw lay flat in the snow. Carvel could see the blood dripping slowly from it.

"You poor devil!" he repeated.

There was no fear in the way he put forth his hand. It was the confidence of a great sincerity and a great compassion. It touched Baree's head and patted it in a brotherly fashion, and then—slowly and with a bit more caution—it went to the trap fastened to Baree's forepaw. In his half-crazed brain Baree was fighting to understand things, and the truth came finally when he felt the steel jaws of the trap open, and he drew forth his maimed foot. He did then what he had done to no other creature but Nepeese. Just once his hot tongue shot out and licked Carvel's hand. The man laughed. With his powerful hands he opened the other traps, and Baree was free.

For a few moments he lay without moving, his eyes fixed on the man. Carvel had seated himself on the snow-covered end of a birch log and was filling his pipe. Baree watched him light it; he noted with new interest the first purplish cloud of smoke that left Carvel's mouth. The man was not more than the length of two trap-chains away—and he grinned at Baree.

"Screw up your nerve, old chap," he encouraged. "No bones broken. Just a little stiff. Mebby we'd better—get out."

He turned his face in the direction of Lac Bain. The suspicion was in his mind that McTaggart might turn back. Perhaps that same suspicion was impressed upon Baree, for when Carvel looked at him again he was on his feet, staggering a bit as he gained his equilibrium. In another moment the outlaw had swung the pack-sack from his shoulders and was opening it. He thrust in his hand and drew out a chunk of raw, red meat.

"Killed it this morning," he explained to Baree. "Yearling bull, tender as partridge—and that's as fine a sweetbread as ever came out from under a backbone. Try it!"

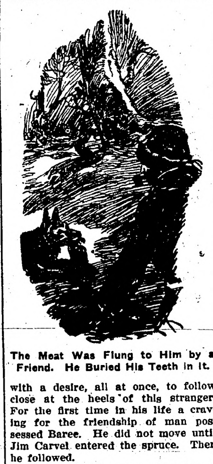
He tossed the flesh to Baree. There was no equivocation in the manner of its acceptance. Baree was famished—and the meat was flung to him by a friend. He buried his teeth in it. His jaws crunched it. New fire leaped into his blood as he feasted, but not for an instant did his reddened eyes leave the other's face. Carvel replaced his pack. He rose to his feet, took up his rifle, slipped on his snowshoes, and fronted the north.

"Come on, Boy," he said. "We've got to travel."

It was a matter-of-fact invitation, as though the two had been traveling companions for a long time. It was, perhaps, not only an invitation but partly a command. It puzzled Baree. For a full half minute he stood motionless in his tracks gazing at Carvel as he strode into the north. A sudden convulsive twitching shot through Baree; he swung his head toward Lac Bain; he looked again at Carvel, and a whine that was scarcely more than a breath came out of his throat. The man was just about to disappear into the thick spruce. He paused, and looked back.

"Coming, Boy?"

Even at that distance Baree could see him grinning affably; he saw the outstretched hand, and the voice stirred new sensations in him. It was not like Pierrot's voice. He had never loved Pierrot. Neither was it soft and sweet, like the Willow's. He had known only a few men, and all of them he had regarded with distrust. But this was a voice that disarmed him. It was lureful in its appeal. He wanted to answer it. He was filled with a desire, all at once, to follow close at the heels of this stranger. For the first time in his life a craving for the friendship of man possessed Baree. He did not move until Jim Carvel entered the spruce. Then he followed.



The Meat Was Flung to Him by a Friend. He Buried His Teeth in It.

That night they were camped in a dense growth of cedars and balsams ten miles north of Bush McTaggart's trap-line. For two hours it had snowed, and their trail was covered. It was still snowing, but not a flake of the white deluge sifted down through the thick canopy of boughs. Carvel had put up his small silk tent, and had built a fire; their supper was over, and Baree lay on his belly facing the outlaw, almost within reach of his hand. With his back to a tree Carvel was smoking luxuriously. He had thrown off his cap and his coat, and in the warm fireglow he looked almost boyishly young. But even in that glow his jaws lost none of their squareness, nor his eyes their clear alertness.

He rubbed his hands together, and held them out toward the fire. Baree watched his movements and listened intently to every sound that escaped his lips. His eyes had in them now a dumb sort of worship, a look that warmed Carvel's heart and did away with the vast loneliness and emptiness of the night. Baree had dragged himself nearer to the man's feet, and suddenly Carvel leaned over and patted his head.

"I'm a bad one, old chap," he chuckled. "You haven't got it on me—not a bit. Want to know what happened?" He waited a moment, and Baree looked at him steadily. Then Carvel went on, as if speaking to a human, "Let's see—it was five years ago, five years this December, just before Christmas time. Had a dad. Fine old chap, my dad was. No mother—just the dad, an' when you added us up we made just One. Understand? And along came a white-striped skunk named Hardy and shot him one day because dad had worked against him in politics. Out an' out murder. An they didn't hang that skunk! No, sir, they didn't hang him. He had too much money, an' too many friends in politics, an' they let 'im off with two years in the penitentiary. But he didn't get there. No—s'elp me God, he didn't get there!"

Carver was twisting his hands until his knuckles cracked. An exultant smile lighted up his face, and his eyes flashed back the firelight. Baree drew a deep breath—a mere coincidence; but it was a tense moment for all that.

"No, he didn't get to the penitentiary," went on Carvel, looking straight at Baree again. "Yours truly knew what that meant, old chap. He'd have been pardoned inside a year. An' there was my dad, the biggest half of me, in his grave. So I just went up to that white-striped skunk right there before the judge's eyes, an' the lawyers' eyes, an' the eyes of all his dear relatives an' friends—and I killed him! And I got away. Was out through a window before they woke up, hit for the bush country, and have been eating up the trails ever since. An' I guess God was with me, Boy. For He did a queer thing to help me out summer before last, just when the Mounties were after me hardest an' it looked pretty black. Man was found drowned down in the Reindeer country, right where they thought I was cornered; an' the good Lord made that man look so much like me that he was buried under my name. So I'm officially dead, old chap. I don't need to be afraid any more so long as I don't get too familiar with people for a year or so longer, and 'way down inside me I've liked to believe God fixed it up in that way to help me out of a bad hole. What's your opinion? Eh?"

He leaned forward for an answer. Baree had listened. Perhaps, in a way, he had understood. But it was another sound than Carvel's voice that came to his ears now. With his head close to the ground he heard it quite distinctly. He whined, and the whine ended in a snarl so low that Carvel just caught the warning note in it. He straightened. He stood up then, and faced the south. Baree stood beside him, his legs tense and his spine bristling.

After a moment Carvel said:

"Relatives of yours, old chap. Wolves."

He went into the tent for his rifle and cartridges.

Baree was on his feet, rigid as hewn rock, when Carvel came out of the tent and for a few moments Carvel stood in silence watching him closely. Would the dog respond to the call of the pack? Did he belong to them? Would he go—now? The wolves were drawing nearer. They were not circling as a caribou or a deer would have circled, but were traveling straight—dead straight for their camp. The significance of this fact was easily understood by Carvel. All that afternoon Baree's feet had left a blood smell in their trail, and the wolves had struck the trail in the deep forest, where the falling snow had not covered it. Carvel was not alarmed. More than once in his five years of wandering between the Arctic and the Height of Land he had played the game with the wolves. Once he had almost lost, but that was out in the open Barren. Tonight he had a fire, and in the event of his firewood running out he had trees he could climb. His anxiety just now was centered in Baree. So he said, making his voice quite casual, "You aren't going, are you, old chap?"

If Baree heard him he gave no evidence of it. But Carvel, still watching him closely, saw that the hair along his spine had risen like a brush, and then he heard—growing slowly in Baree's throat—a snarl of ferocious hatred. It was the sort of snarl that had held back the Factor from Lac Bain, and Carvel, opening the breech of his gun to see that all was right, chuckled happily. Baree may have heard the chuckle. Perhaps it meant something to him, for he turned his head suddenly and with flattened ears looked at his companion.

Authors Who Evinced Interest in Cookery

If the stories of Brillat-Savarin which it is proposed to publish in commemoration of his centenary reveal their author to the world as a successful writer of fiction as well as a gastronomer, he may perhaps be regarded as repaying the interest which some noted novelists have taken in matters of the table. Balzac took a keen interest in cookery, as befitted a man of gigantic appetite. So also did George Sand, whose cookery must have been pretty good, since it was reputed to be as exciting as her romances. Joseph Conrad, as he admitted in connection with a cook book written by Mrs. Conrad, gave a high place in his esteem to the culinary arts, while George Meredith left a book of cookery receipts in his own handwriting which figured in a book seller's catalogue some years ago and may possibly yet appear in print.

Crops North of "53"

Wheat, oats and similar grain have been found to ripen satisfactorily in that part of Canada north of the fifty-third parallel. Four varieties of wheat have been tried, some ripening in ninety-eight days. The yields varied twenty-three to forty bushels, depending on the variety, and from fifty-four to seventy-three bushels of oats to the acre were obtained, depending also on the variety planted. The experiment is considered important for Canadian development.

When the Skies Fall

By MARTHA M. WILLIAMS

(Copyright.)

"LORD! LORD!" Priscilla May burst out. "Why don't something happen? I feel like I'd been dead a week—and had no hope of any resurrection."

"How d'ye know, Prissy? Canst recall former existences and passings?" Sister Helen mocked—her mission was breaking Prissy's moods.

"Tell you that after I'm revivified—as you never will be," Prissy chaffed. She was tall and twenty, rich, a beauty, and very, very badly spoiled. Inevitably, with nothing masculine nearer than second cousin to offset a phalanx of adoring aunts, a brace of grandmothers to both of whom she summed perfection, to say nothing of swarming beaux.

She didn't dream it, but it was her great charm that halted a happiness she had a sultry thirst to grasp. George Lee-Vernon would have loved her for the looking at her, if he had let himself. Rather he was held from doing it by the scar upon his heart. An old story now—it ought never to throb and sting him. But it did—and it was there in token that another woman with the same charm had earlier won him—and played him false. Since then his chief concern had been not to forget her, but to armor himself against all such attacks. He would marry, of course—after awhile. There must be Lee Vernons to follow him—but they should be scientifically bred, carefully born and trained. Their mother a lady—that went without saying—handsome, healthy, with neither too much nor too little brain. Helen was, to speak truth, much nearer the specification he had set forth—yet to him was merely an adjunct of Priscilla. D—n the luck that had brought him home for the quail shooting first time in five years, to find the sisters resting at little old Maywold, the original family seat, from the wear and tear of a hectic social year. He had known them at second hand and long—this was his first encounter in the flesh. Brief but romantic—he had all but run them down defying speed limits at the edge of dusk. Safety for them had meant a wrecked car, a potential fatality. Helen had screamed, all but fainted—it was Priscilla who had sworn at him, a good mouth-filling oath ordering him out of sight with a stamp of the foot, and eyes that shot sparks. Yet when he made due apologies next day, she had smiled at him indulgently, saying with a shrug: "You got heap the worst of it—but we shan't insult you offering you a new car." Which might have eased the tense situation if Helen had not pleaded plaintively: "Please forget? Have pity on weary pilgrims seeking real rest."

Muttering a pledge, bowing as became his name, he had gone away. He'd tried to obey—but somehow vagrant eyes had more than once feasted upon Priscilla's face—and read there that she was deadly sick of solitude. Being no hermit, he got quickly, through kindly gossip, the low-down on the sisters—they had run away from worrying elders to Maywold, for a freedom cure—self-appointed. Sent on big dogs and saddle stock ahead, fetched along Tobe and his wife Maria, as faithful as they were black.

When at last by Fate's decree, he got sight of them, it was to find the half had not been told him. Sight came to pass upon the third day of shooting—in this wise—else it might never have come at all. Maywold was open ground—anyone who would might shoot there. Besides, the untilled land overgrown with thickets, briars and sedge, provided the best of cover which upon a mild October morning was vocal with calling Bob Whites. Lee-Vernon would have stopped ears to the calling—there was no stopping the dogs, nor the other men. For an hour the blurry boom of shotguns filled all the sunlit world—sport often dreamed of, rarely met with, made the sportsmen careless of everything else. Of the orchard just beyond, the shallow rainpool whence their dogs lapped thirstily, the crashing surge through an overgrown hedge of sleek sinuous bodies—an airedale, a mastiff, a greyhound, which fell upon the other dogs with sportive barks, overset them, tumbled them about, pretending to growl. Bemis, a visitor, loved his dog, a champion, a bit better than himself—instantly he fired both barrels above the squirming mass, crying wildly: "Stop that! Stop, I say!"

"Stop something yourself," a gay voice cried, just as a ripe red apple took him full between the eyes. The rest looking up saw Priscilla, bareheaded, flushed and laughing perched perilously in an apple crotch, and clinging with one hand to a slender high bough. She nodded to Lee-Vernon, saying: "Introduce your friends. Helen's so sick of seeing only me you'll look like manna from heaven. See her smiling—over in that tree yonder—follow her to the house—you're thirsty I know—and we've cider to tap."

"You're coming, too," Lee-Vernon interrupted.

She smiled saucily: "I have to swing down," she said. "Can't do that before an audience." Fate said she could—for as she spoke the tall bough, bent, broke—held her up a bare second—but that sufficed to land her in Lee-Vernon's safe hold, where, he said in her ear: "When the skies fall we catch larks."

WEIGHED ONLY 98 POUNDS

Helped by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Cleveland, Ohio.—"I have really had all kinds of trouble. After having my first baby, I lost weight, no matter what I did. Then a doctor told me I would be better if I had another baby, which I did. But I got worse, was always sickly and went down to 98 pounds. My neighbor told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it helped her very much, so I tried it. After taking four bottles, I weigh 116 pounds. It has just done wonders for me and I can do my housework now without one bit of trouble."—MRS. M. RIESSINGER, 10004 Nelson Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

If some good fairy should appear and offer to grant your heart's desire, what would you choose?

Wealth? It's a transient thing that brings it's own cares.

Happiness? It's an elusive thing which we keep by giving away.

Health? That's the best gift. Health is riches that gold cannot buy and surely health is cause enough for happiness.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound may be the good fairy who offers you the priceless gift of better health.

EVEN IN HIS DREAMS

By H. M. EGBERT

(© by W. G. Chapman.)

JOHN TARBOX sat at his desk, his head bent over a sheet of white paper. His fountain pen was poised between his fingers. He was a writer and in a moment he would be plunged into the sweet delirium of creative literature.

Suddenly a disturbing element burst in upon his peace. Tarbox looked up. Beside him, with a half loving, half pitying, wholly maternal expression upon her face, stood one of the prettiest women imaginable. Her hair was soft and fluffy, her gentle gray eyes sparkled with good-humored tolerance and kindly good will.

"John, dear, here is a letter for you," said this apparition. "Do you want the turnips mashed for supper or boiled whole?"

John groaned in spirit.

"Put it down, Molly," he said. "The turnips? Oh, any old way."

Molly Tarbox placed the letter upon the table.

"I'll leave it here so that you won't forget to read it," she said. "I do hope it is an offer of a position. And remember, John dear," she shook her finger warningly, "there isn't much money left, even for turnips. Have you got an idea?"

"Yes!" yelled her husband, running his fingers through his hair.

Molly smiled discerningly and withdrew. There had been a time when she would have been dismayed at John's speaking to her in that tone of voice. But she was wiser now. She went out of the room, still smiling.

John Tarbox groaned in desolation of spirit.

"Turnips!" he muttered contemptuously. "And now it's gone! Just when I had the situation in hand—gone! Spoiled for a turnip! Oh, why didn't I marry a woman who would have understood me?"

John Tarbox was not a brute; he was a creative artist. He and Molly loved each other sincerely. But Molly was not artistic by temperament; if she had been there would probably not even have been turnips.

John Tarbox lowered his head upon his arms in agony of soul, and presently he fell into an uneasy sleep. In his sleep he had a strange succession of dreams.

Dream No. 1. John Tarbox, coated with white dust and seated among a number of heaps of squared-slabs, was chipping with a chisel upon the surface of a glazed brick. Upon his head was a sort of mitre, which only partly warded off the rays of a very hot sun. He was chiseling out a series of strange, arrow-like marks upon the glazed surface in front of him, and he seemed to understand perfectly what he was doing, although he could not have explained it.

A disturbing element broke in upon his peace. He looked up. Beside him, wearing a half loving, half pitying, and wholly maternal expression upon her face, stood one of the prettiest women imaginable. She was dressed in a long, flowing blanket, and her dark hair was bound back with a fillet. The words she spoke, though strange, were perfectly intelligible to him.

"John, dear," he understood her to say, "Melchisedek, the high priest, says that if you will do some inscriptions for him upon the temple columns, he will pay you 65 shekels a month. His majesty wants to make a few remarks about his victory over the Jebusites. Do you want the kid stewed or fried in palm oil for supper?"

John Tarbox groaned in spirit.

"Tell Melchisedek to go to Gehenna," he answered. "Cook the kid any old way. Boil it in its mother's milk. Now you've driven that idea clean out of my head."

He was alone again. He looked up at the blue expanse of the sky.

"Oh, Bel," he prayed, "next time thou bringest me back to earthly life, bestow on me a woman who can understand me."

Dream No. 2. John Tarbox, wearing a short, tight blanket of goat's hair, sat in the shade of a colonnade, writing with a reed pen upon a roll of papyrus. He had just dipped his pen into the inkhorn when a disturbing influence arrested his hand. He looked up, to see beside him, wearing a half loving, half pitying and wholly maternal expression, one of the prettiest women in the world. She was dressed, like himself, in a blanket, only longer, and her jet-black hair fell about her shoulders.

"John," she said to him in a tongue which was quite comprehensible, though strange, "here's a chance for us to get a little bit ahead. The prophet Jeremiah says he can use a lamentation every day except the Sabbath. He says he has got tired of repeating himself, and if you have the goods, let him see them. How would you like the scape-goat cooked this afternoon?"

John Tarbox threw out his hand and tipped the inkhorn over.

"Tell him to go to Jericho!" he roared. "Now you've put that prophecy of mine clean out of my head."

He bowed his head among the temple columns. "Why wasn't I born in the patriarchal age!" he groaned.

Dream No. 3. John Tarbox, clothed in a nine-foot blanket and wearing No. 10 sandals, was seated at a low table, etching upon a waxed tablet with a sort of darning needle. He worked fast and furiously, absorbed in his task. But as he wrote he became conscious of a disturbing element in the situation. He looked up, to see beside him, wearing a half loving, half pitying, and wholly maternal expression upon her face, one of the prettiest women imaginable. Her flowing robe was girdled at the waist, and her red hair was coiled gracefully at the back of her head.

"John, dear," she said, in a partly familiar language whose import, nevertheless, was very clear to him, "Casius Caesar's head slave is waiting in the atrius. Caesar says he wants 2,000 more words about his Gaelic wars for his publisher before sunset tomorrow, on the same terms as before, Caesar to supply all the material. And Luculius has sent us 15 nightingales' tongues, which were left over from his party last night. Would you rather have them scalloped or en brochette?"

John Tarbox groaned in agony of soul.

"Tell Caesar I've got etcher's cramp," he answered. "The tongues? Oh, can them! Now you've made me forget what I was going to write about."

He was alone. Every vestige of an idea had left him. His stylus fell from his hand.

"Oh, Proserpine," he prayed, "who presidest over the destinies of mortals, next time thou sendest me forth from the infernal regions, send with me a woman who has the power to understand me!"

Dream No. 4. John Tarbox, dressed in a linen sack coat, with bare legs somewhat mottled by the east wind, was standing upon a castle parapet, fingering a mandolin. His eyes were directed toward a small barred window, a few feet above his head, at which the Countess Leopardheart occasionally took the air. A love song, which had just come to him, hovered upon his lips.

But before he could fit the first word to the tune he became conscious of a disturbing element in the situation. At the barred window appeared the face, not of the Countess Leopardheart, but of one of the prettiest women imaginable. She wore a half loving, half pitying, and wholly maternal expression upon her face, and her long, amber-colored hair was held high over her head with two tortoise shell pins and a bird cage.

"John, dear," she said, in a tongue which reminded him of the French class that his wife used to attend, "I just dropped in to see the countess, and she says she hasn't time to come to the window, because Count Leopardheart is expected back from the second crusade this afternoon, but she wants me to drop down this rose to you, and if you'll compose a martial air in honor of his return she'll get you a position about the castle. And, John, she's ordered a barbecue from the butcher, and wonders whether you think it ought to be stuffed or not."

John Tarbox's mandolin fell from his nerveless fingers, and the wind blew icy cold about his knees.

"Tell her to go to Antioch!" he shouted. "Now you've made me forget every word of that madrigal!"

He turned away. "If the heresy be true of those who say that we come more than once to birth," he mused, "may I obtain a woman next time who will understand me!" He stopped, for a sudden light had come to him. "Haven't I met that woman somewhere before?" he asked.

John Tarbox awoke. A strong odor of turnips, which had wafted into his room from the region below, warned him that supper time was at hand. He looked around him, dazed by the strange experiences which he had undergone. Upon the cover of his paper-box a letter lay. John opened and read it.

"John, dear," said Molly, coming out of the kitchen, "can you eat layer cake without the layer? I left it out by accident."

John waved the letter at her.

"Never mind that! Listen, Molly! Griggs wants me to do some writing for him."

"Mr. Griggs!" exclaimed his wife. "What sort of writing can he have to offer you?"

"He wants me to write insurance policies," answered John. "And, Molly—" He looked at her and hesitated. "I'm glad I've got you, my dear, and I think I ought to accept after it has been offered to me so many times, don't you?"

"I don't know what you mean, John," answered Molly, "but supper's ready."

Record Naval Action Occurred at Fort Fisher

The statement of historians that the main assault in the Civil war upon Fort Fisher, at the mouth of the Cape Fear river, in North Carolina, was the greatest naval bombardment in the world's history, never has been disputed—that is, in the number of ships engaged and guns used. Of course larger battleships and guns were employed in the World war in the battle of Jutland.

The fall of Fort Fisher, in January, 1865, broke the resistance of the Confederacy. It was no longer possible for Lee and his army to obtain, by means of blockade runners, the supplies of medicine, food and clothing so necessary to a continuance of the struggle. Therefore, the inevitable had to be faced, says a writer in the Charlotte (N. C.) News and Observer. Lee's surrender to Grant followed the fall of Fort Fisher within 90 days.

GENERAL MOTORS

LOOK AT THE NEW CARS AND SEE—BODY BY FISHER

The new car announcements of General Motors have swept Fisher into the greatest eminence in motor car history.

Everywhere you see the emblem—Body by Fisher. In all price classes, it is the inescapable badge of quality. The leaders, such as Cadillac, Buick, Chevrolet, Oakland, Oldsmobile and Pontiac, all display as one of their proudest assets the symbol—Body by Fisher.

It is their assurance of public satisfaction—in safety, in charm of line, in beauty of color and appointment, in comfort and convenience.

Fisher—the greatest body builder in the world—stands head and shoulders above all others in quality. The new General Motors cars all help to prove Fisher leadership.

Increase in Demand for Higher Education

Registration in 913 colleges, universities, and professional schools of the United States increased nearly six times as rapidly as population in the 34 years from 1890 to 1924. From 121,942 in 1890 the number of students in these institutions mounted to 664,266 in 1924, a growth of 445 per cent, as shown by statistics compiled by the Interior department, bureau of education. During the same period enrollment in secondary schools increased 951 per cent, about 12 times as rapidly as general population, which increased 78 per cent during this time. Corresponding increase appears in teaching personnel. The number of professors and teachers in colleges universities, and professional schools of the country, exclusive of instructors engaged in preparatory departments, jumped during this time from 10,762 to 51,907.

Sharpshooters Stung

Mosquitoes mar marksmanship in Porto Rico, where the sniper is being sniped. A target practice report reaching the War department from the Sixty-fifth infantry at San Juan, P. R., states: "Aside from the heat experienced during the month, the mosquitoes have been so thick as to seriously interfere with the efficiency of the work."

Details are omitted and War department officials are wondering whether clouds of mosquitoes obscured the targets or whether marksmanship was afflicted with disaster from the mosquito either on the front sight or on the rifleman's nose.

City Water From Glacier

The city of Boulder, Colo., has taken steps to purchase from the United States government the land occupied by the Arapahoe glacier, distant about fifteen miles from the city, with the object of supplementing the city's water supply from the melting ice. According to the weather bureau of the United States Department of Agriculture, this is the first instance of a town or city in this country deriving a part of its water supply from a glacier.

We Do STATIONERY PRINTING on HAMMERMILL BOND

We Have Invested in the Business of our Customers.

Financing is the most important initial consideration of any new business enterprise. Men with confidence in the future of the business must provide the necessary funds and bring it into being.

In this day of advanced power development, promoters of business need never question whether or not the necessary power will be available when they are ready for it. They know that it will be. They know that the Light and Power Company is daily providing for any expansion demand that may arise.

In order to do this, however, the Power Company must invest considerable money in the customer's enterprise. We are therefore anxious that your business be successful so that we also may realize on our invesment.

The average manufacturer turns over his capital once a year, some more often, and the merchant's turnover is still higher. If manufacturers and merchants were forced to provide their own power needs, their investment would be greatly increased, and the length of time necessary to turn over their capital, materially increased.

Electric Light and Power Companies turn over their capital only about once in five years. They must content themselves with small earnings on their investment.

The Railroad Business; A Sad Story

This is the sad story of a carload of material.

It throws some light on the railroad business, as it is practised.

A man in Argyle, Minnesota, wanted some material, and it was ordered for him from a lumber yard in Warren, ten miles south of Argyle. The stuff was loaded and shipped.

But did the railroad haul it ten miles north to Argyle, and deliver it at once?

Not at all. There is no freight train going north that "peddles" shipments to small stations. So the car was first shipped some thirty miles south to Crookston.

At Crookston it was unloaded and reloaded, and then shipped north nearly a hundred miles to St. Vincent, going directly thru Argyle, where it was wanted.

At St. Vincent it was once more unloaded and reloaded on a southbound freightrain that does "peddle." After a journey of more than fifty miles it arrived at its original destination, Argyle.

But the shipment of material in traveling back and forth some two hundred miles in order to go ten, and in being handled three times, took five days for the journey.

And alas! the Argyle man had grown tired of waiting for his stuff from Warren, and had cancelled the order.

Is it any wonder that the truck is taking short-distance hauling away from the railroads? And where is the profit to a railroad in hauling a carload of freight two hundred miles and handle it twice en route, in order to deliver it ten miles away?

An extreme case? Yes but it is illustrative—it gives one to think.—Warren Register.

World's prize stock & crops

An Exposition of stock and farm crops, bigger and more comprehensive than any show of the kind ever seen at a state fair, will be a feature of the great Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Dairy Exposition, Twin Cities, September 4 to 11.

Pure-bred cows, prancing horses, grunting hogs, and broad-backed sheep, valued at more than a million dollars, are coming from every part of America to compete for the princely prizes offered by the fair.

The Crops show will be a hummer. It will present the finest exhibits of grains, grasses, corn, vegetables and fruits, ever assembled in the West.

Eighty acres of latest farm machinery, a style revue, a $500,000.00 Art Show, and 1,100 farm boys and girls in club work, are big features.

The big Northwest Auto Show, enlarged woman's work exhibit, a display by Minnesota's leading departments and institutions, and a health show with new features, are other attractions. You'll think it's the "Fair of a Thousand Thrills," when you see it.

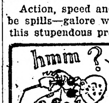
STATE FAIR BILL FULL OF THRILLS

World's Greatest Features Engaged for World's Greatest Fair, Sept. 4 to 11.

THE Fair of a Thousand Thrills." These six words summarize the gigantic entertainment program to be presented by the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Dairy Exposition, Twin Cities, September 4 to 11.

Action, speed and thrills—and maybe spills—galore will be furnished by this stupendous program. Circus and hippodrome attractions recruited from all parts of the old and new world, including Japan, China, Russia, Arabia, Britain, Argentine and America, will pass in kaleidoscopic review



FLYING: In a big day and evening show, Miss Gladys Roy, new Queen of the Air, from California, will essay feats never attempted by woman or man. In her feature act she walks blindfolded on the wings of her plane, her head in a great black sack, padlocked at the neck. She will land on the track in front of the grandstand, hanging from the running gear of her ship.

CIRCUS ACTS: Thirteen big headliners, featuring the world's greatest gymnasts, tumblers, acrobats, aerialists, contortionists, jugglers, trapezists and animal trainers will make up the vaudeville program.

HORSE RACING: More than 250 of the leading pacers, trotters and runners of the country will be seen in action in the harness and running horse events on the program. Four days of horse racing are scheduled, Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, September 6, 7, 9 and 10 respectively, being given over to the horses. Purses totaling $24,000.00 with entry money to be added, are offered.

AUTO RACING: Two dozen speed demons, representing the cream of the dirt track auto racing world, will shake dice with death in the three big racing matinees to be staged the opening and closing Saturday afternoons and Wednesday, Sept. 8.

BAND MUSIC: Sixteen bands, orchestras and drum corps have been engaged for the musical program. The big feature will be Roy D. Smith's Royal Scotch Highlanders, of St. Petersburg, Fla., one of the best known bands in the world.

FIREWORKS: "1776," the most elaborate and stupendous fireworks spectacle ever attempted, will vividly portray in pageantry and fire many of the historical scenes connected with the founding of our Republic. "1776" will be an exact reproduction of the fireworks feature presented at the Sesquicentennial Exposition in Philadelphia this summer, commemorating the 150th anniversary of the birth of Our Nation.

MIDWAY: RUBIN and CHERRY, one of the four leading amusement organizations of the country, will make their first appearance on the fair's midway. Thirty big, new attractions and up-to-date rides will be found on "Pleasure Row."

G. N. Depot at Middle River Burns

The Great Northren depot at Middle River burned down on Saturday evening at about 11 o'clock. The fire was started from a bolt of lightning that hit the structure during the heavy rain and electric storm which we had that night.

Andrew Sorum Injured In Smashup

Word was received here last Friday that Andrew Sorum son of Mr. and Mrs. John Sorum was hurt quite badly in a wreck on Thtrsday evening. Mr. Sorum is employed by the State highway department and was on his way home to Crookston from Warroad with a heavy load of tractor wheels. When about a mile north of Thief River Falls one of the front wheels came of the truck and it ran head on into the road ditch. The sudden stop caused the load of wheels to slide ahead demolishing the truck cab and crushing Mr. Sorum in the wreckage. He was rushed to one of the hospitals at Thief River Falls.

We had some more rain this week which made the roads a little slippery but we are satisfied.

The wolves were silent now. Carvel knew what that meant, and he was tensely alert. In the stillness the click of the safety on his rifle sounded with metallic sharpness. For many minutes they heard nothing but the crack of the fire. Suddenly Baree's muscles seemed to snap. He sprang back, and faced the quarter behind Carvel, his head level with his shoulders, his inch-long fangs gleaming as he snarled into the black caverns of the forest beyond the rim of firelight. Carvel had turned like a shot. It was almost frightening—what he saw. A pair of eyes burning with greenish fire, and then another pair, and after that so many of them that he could not have counted them. He gave a sudden gasp. They were like cat-eyes, only much larger. Some of them, catching the firelight fully, were red as coals, others flashed blue and green—living things without bodies. With a swift glance he took in the black circle of the forest. They were out there, too; they were on all sides of them, but where he had seen them first they were thickest. In these first few seconds he had forgotten Baree, awed almost to stupefaction by that monster-eyed cordon of death that hemmed them in. There were fifty—perhaps a hundred wolves out there, afraid of nothing in all this savage world but fire. They had come up without the sound of a padded foot or a broken twig. If it had been later, and they had been asleep, and the fire out——

He shuddered, and for a moment the thought got the better of his nerves. He had not intended to shoot except from necessity, but all at once his rifle came to his shoulder and he sent a stream of fire out where the eyes were thickest. Baree knew what the shots meant, and filled with the mad desire to get at the throat of one of his enemies he dashed in their direction. Carvel gave a startled yell as he went. He saw the flash of Baree's body, saw it swallowed up in the gloom, and in that same instant heard the deadly clash of fangs and the impact of bodies. A wild thrill shot through him. The dog had charged alone—and the wolves had waited. There could be but one end. His four-footed comrade had gone straight into the jaws of death!

He could hear the ravening snap of those jaws out in the darkness. It was sickening. His hand went to the Colt .45 at his belt, and he thrust his empty rifle butt downward into the snow. With the big automatic before his eyes he plunged out into the darkness, and from his lips there issued a wild yelling that could have been heard a mile away. With the yelling a steady stream of fire spat from the Colt into the mass of fighting beasts. There were eight shots in the automatic, and not until the plunger clicked with metallic emptiness did Carvel cease his yelling and retreat into the firelight. He listened, breathing deeply. He no longer saw eyes in the darkness, nor did he hear the movement of bodies. The suddenness and ferocity of his attack had driven back the wolf-horde. But the dog! He caught his breath, and strained his eyes. A shadow was dragging itself into the circle of light. It was Baree. Carvel ran to him, put his arms under his shoulders, and brought him to the fire.

For a long time after that there was a questioning light in Carvel's eyes. He reloaded his guns, put fresh fuel on the fire, and from his pack dug out strips of cloth with which he bandaged three or four of the deepest cuts in Baree's legs. And a dozen times he asked, in a wondering sort of way, "Now what the deuce made you do that, old chap? What have you got against the wolves?"

All that night he did not sleep, but watched.

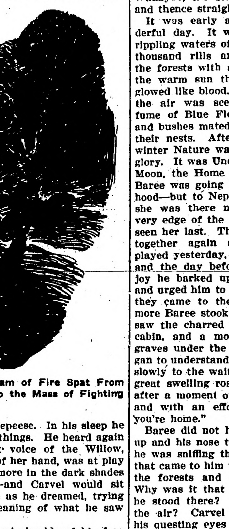
* * * * * * *

Their experience with the wolves broke down the last bit of uncertainty that might have existed beween the man and the dog. For days after that, as they traveled slowly north and west, Carvel nursed Baree as he might have cared for a sick child. Because of the dog's hurts, he made only a few miles a day. Baree understood, and in him there grew stronger and stronger a great love for the man whose hands were as gentle as the Willow's and whose voice warmed him with the thrill of an immeasurable comradeship. He no longer feared him or had a suspicion of him.

It was the wanderer's intention to swing over into the country of the Great Slave, a good eight hundred miles to the north and west, before the mush-snows came. From there, when the waters opened in springtime, he planned to travel by canoe westward to the Mackenzie and ultimately to the mountains of British Columbia. These plans were changed in February. They were caught in a great storm in the Wholdaia Lake country, and when their fortunes looked darkest Carvel stumbled on a cabin in the heart of a deep spruce forest, and in this cabin there was a dead man. He had been dead for many days, and was frozen stiff. Carvel chopped a hole in the earth and buried him.

The cabin was a treasure trove to Carvel and Baree, and especially to the man. It evidently possessed no other owner than the one who had died; it was comfortable and stocked with provisions; and more than that, its owner had made a splendid catch of fur before the frost bit his lungs, and he died. Carvel went over them carefully and joyously. They were worth a thousand dollars at any post, and he could see no reason why they did not belong to him now. Within a week he had blazed out the dead man's snow-covered trap-line and was trapping on his own account.

This was two hundred miles north and west of the Gray Loon, and with each day that passed, the sun rose higher in the sky; it grew warmer; the snow softened under foot, and in the air was the tremulous and growing throb of spring. With these things came the old yearning to Baree—the heart-thrilling call of the lonely graves back on the Gray Loon, of the burned cabin, the abandoned tepee beyond the pool—and of Nepeese. In his sleep he saw visions of things. He heard again the low, sweet voice of the Willow, felt the touch of her hand, was at play with her once more in the dark shades of the forest—and Carvel would sit and watch him as he dreamed, trying to read the meaning of what he saw and heard.



A Steady Stream of Fire Spat From the Colt Into the Mass of Fighting Beasts.

In April Carvel shouldered his furs up to the Hudson's Bay company's post at Lac la Biche, which was still farther north. Baree accompanied him halfway, and then—at sundown Carvel returned to the cabin and found him there. He was so overjoyed that he caught the dog's head in his arms and hugged it. They lived in the cabin until May. The buds were swelling then, and the smell of growing things had begun to rise up out of the earth.

That night he packed up.

"It's time to travel," he announced to Baree. "And I've sort of changed my mind. We're going back—there."

And he pointed south.

Chapter XVI

A strange humor possessed Carvel as he began the southward journey. He did not believe in omens, good or bad. Superstition had played a small part in his life, but he possessed both curiosity and a love for adventure, and his years of lonely wandering had developed in him a wonderfully clear mental vision of things, which in other words might be called singularly active imagination. He knew that some irresistible force was drawing Baree back into the south—that it was pulling him not only along a given line of the compass, but to an exact point in that line. For no reason in particular the situation began to interest him more and more, and as his time was valueless, and he had no fixed destination in view, he began to experiment. For the first two days he marked the dog's course by compass. It was due southeast. On the third morning Carvel purposely struck a course straight west. He noted quickly the change in Baree—his restlessness at first, and after that the dejected manner in which he followed at his heels. Toward noon Carvel swung sharply to the south and east again, and almost immediately Baree regained his old eagerness, and ran ahead of his master.

After this, for many days, Carvel followed the trail of the dog.

"Mebby I'm an idiot, old chap," he apologized one evening. "But it's a bit of fun, after all—an' I've got to hit the line of rail before I can get over to the mountains, so what's the difference? I'm game—so long as you don't take me back to that chap at Lac Bain. Now—what the devil! Are you hitting for his trap-line to get even? If that's the case—"

He blew out a cloud of smoke from his pipe as he eyed Baree, and Baree, with his head between his forepaws, eyed him back.

A week later Baree answered Carvel's question by swinging westward to give a wide berth to Post Lac Bain. It was mid-afternoon when they crossed the trail along which Bush McTaggart's traps and deadfalls had been set. Baree did not even pause. He headed due south, traveling so fast that at times he was lost to Carvel's sight. A suppressed but intense excitement possessed him, and he whined whenever Carvel stopped to rest—always with his nose sniffing the wind out of the south. Springtime, the flowers, the earth turning green, the singing of birds, and the sweet breaths in the air were bringing him back to that great Yesterday when he had belonged to Nepeese. In his unreasoning mind there existed no longer a winter. The long months of cold and hunger were gone; in the new visionings that filled his brain they were forgotten. The birds and flowers and the blue skies had come back, and with them the Willow must surely have returned, and she was waiting for him now, just over there beyond that rim of green forest.

Something greater than mere curiosity began to take possession of Carvel. A whimsical humor became a fixed and deeper thought, an unreasoning anticipation that was accompanied by a certain thrill of subdued excitement. By the time they reached the old beaver-pond the mystery of the strange adventure had a firm hold on him. From Beaver-tooth's colony Baree led him to the creek along which Wakayoo, the black bear, had fished, and thence straight to the Gray Loon.

It was early afternoon of a wonderful day. It was so still that the rippling waters of spring, singing in a thousand rills and streamlets, filled the forests with a droning music. In the warm sun the crimson bakneesh glowed like blood. In the open spaces the air was scented with the perfume of Blue Flowers. In the trees and bushes mated birds were building their nests. After the long sleep of winter Nature was at work in all her glory. It was Unekepesim, the Mating Moon, the Home Building Moon—and Baree was going home. Not to matehood—but to Nepeese. He knew that she was there now, perhaps at the very edge of the chasm where he had seen her last. They would be playing together again soon, as they had played yesterday, and the day before, and the day before that, and in his joy he barked up into Carvel's face, and urged him to greater speed. Then they came to the clearing, and once more Baree stook like a rock. Carvel saw the charred ruins of the burned cabin, and a moment later the two graves under the tall spruce. He began to understand as his eyes returned slowly to the waiting, listening dog. A great swelling rose in his throat, and after a moment or two he said softly, and with an effort, "Boy, I guess you're home."

Baree did not hear. With his head up and his nose tilted to the blue sky he was sniffing the air. What was it that came to him with the perfumes of the forests and the green meadow? Why was it that he trembled now as he stood there? What was there in the air? Carvel asked himself, and his questing eyes tried to answer the questions. Nothing. There was death—death and desertion, that was all. And then, all at once, there came from Baree a strange cry—almost a human cry—and he was gone like the wind.

Carvel had thrown off his pack. He dropped his rifle beside it now, and followed Baree. He ran swiftly, straight across the open, into the dwarf balsams, and into a grass-grown path that had once been worn by the travel of feet. He ran until he was panting for breath, and then stopped and listened. He could hear nothing of Baree. But that old worn trail led on under the forest trees, and he followed it.

Old Monarchical Idea

The name "Divine Right of Kings" is given to a doctrine that was promulgated in England in the Seventeenth century. It asserted that kings held their authority by divine appointment and were earthly representatives of the Deity. This principle relieved the sovereign of all responsibility toward his subjects, and gave him absolute claim to their obedience. The chief defenders of this dogma were Salmasius, Hobbes and Sir Robert Filmer; while Milton, Algernon Sydney and Harrington were its uncompromising opponents. The controversy died a natural death on the accession of the House of Hanover. In the Bill of Rights (1689) the right of the people to depose the sovereign, to alter the order of succession, and to confer the sovereignty on whomsoever they may think proper is distinctly set forth.—Kansas City Star.

Master Sculptor

Myron, the celebrated Greek sculptor, who lived in the Fifth century, B. C., was noted for the action of his statues, mainly of athletes. He showed them as actually engaged in contest rather than merely posing.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

(©, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

She "Couldn't Be Bothered"

"I can't be bothered!"

The woman who said it had said it often. In fact the remark might be regarded as typical of her.

In her youth she "couldn't be bothered" with children. Later on everyone thought she had realized her mistake and that she would grasp the opportunity to adopt the child of a sister who died. But she "couldn't be bothered."

She had a family, of course, a brother with children, and an old aunt, but she "couldn't be bothered" spending much time with them. She "couldn't be bothered" with friends, either. Friends are almost as bad as a family in making demands on one. And she "couldn't be bothered." So instead of friends she had mere companions of the moment's pleasure.

She wanted her time and her thoughts free to wear beautiful clothes and see everything and do everything that went on, to travel and be "up" on the latest kind of shoe buckle and the newest dance steps. She married a much older man who gave her plenty of money and plenty of leisure to indulge in all these pleasures and who did not "tie her down" at all. She had her freedom in this beautiful world full of beautiful things and the wherewithal to satisfy every desire. So each year she grew more disinclined to "be bothered" with anything that was not in the pursuit of pleasure, and more dependent for her happiness on the enjoyment of the moment.

Then came the day when her youth was gone, and with it the energy to pursue the will-o'-the-wisp called pleasure. Her husband had died and her only human tie was a paid companion. She had traveled all over the world, seen "everything," done "everything," had "everything"—that money could buy. But everything palled, life was empty and without reason. She felt she had nothing to live for.

On meeting a distant relative, a beloved mother and grandmother, a woman who was responsible for a fine charity and who had also the accomplishment of a successful career in the work she had chosen, the woman who "couldn't be bothered" said to her, "I envy you. You have everything, and I have nothing. Why should this be?"

Yet how obvious was the answer. They were getting each just what she deserved, reaping as they had sowed. The woman who "couldn't be bothered" with anything but enjoyment, who had spent her life in seeking pleasures, while they lasted, and in later life reaped the emptiness which comes of having given nothing, the void which is the heritage of those who have planted no seed from which might bloom the flower of love, of gratitude, of accomplishment. She had given nothing, and life now returned nothing.

To the other woman growing old meant not emptiness and the end of things, but the richness of fulfillment, the luxurious harvest of a blessed reaping time. Why? She had sowed. She had loved, not pleasures but humans. She had given herself freely. The devotion of children, the clinging caress, now in her old age, of new baby arms, she had earned.

Forgiving Is Forgetting

"I can forgive but I cannot forget!"

The speaker did not realize that instead of the sweetness of magnanimity her words carried the hardness of a harbored hate.

For there is no forgiveness without forgetting. Little human frailties that are woven into a personality we love may be overlooked. But deep hurts, a strained relation, anything that smacks of bitterness, must be forgotten to be forgiven.

Bitterness that is remembered rankles; and like the head of an ugly snake it creeps out when the two hearts would come together again.

"To forgive but not forget" is insincere. It is only tongue forgiveness. It says, "I will be magnanimous, but don't think you are getting away with it. Things will never be the same."

Real bigness forgives with the heart and says: "We will wipe the slate clean and call it quits—forget it."

In almost every human relationship there comes a time of misunderstanding and hurt that imperils the closest, most valued friendships—even love. And frequently after reconciliation and so-called forgiveness the two hearts cry out for each other but the inability to forget stands between them.

There is the hurt that cannot be healed by explanations. We wish it could, for we want our friend or sweetheart. We crave the old comradeship and sweet communion, yet there between us stalks the specter of the wrong we would forgive but cannot forget. If we but realize here the truth of the old saying, "To err is human, to forgive divine," we can waive the explanation, charge it up to human frailty and forgive—which means to forget, absolutely, finally and unequivocally and take back our sweetheart or friend.

Orange Harvest

In Florida oranges are taken from the trees from the latter part of October and the first of November until April. In California they are gathered all the year around. The new crop begins about November 1.

The Ties That Bind

By DOROTHY WEST

(Copyright.)

EVERY night he would traverse the length of the garden to the distant, lofty oak and stare down, for a brief and bitter moment, at the grave of his mother. And inevitably he would stoop to pluck a long-stemmed flower and twine it about his wrist. There was something terribly brutal about it. A mocking reassurance of a deathbed promise.

He hated the valley. He hated the splendid stretch of land that for generations had belonged to the family, riotous, neglected now save for a small patch of garden that supplied his daily needs.

He had chained himself by a deathbed promise to the rolling, far-reaching acres a sentimental mother loved. He had been too young and too awfully sorry to foresee the droning years. He had wanted, with youthful pity, to make her last moments happy. And so he had promised, eagerly, forever to live in the valley.

And then there had been her weak voice calling Martha; the young Martha kneeling beside her with tears in her eyes. And suddenly she had joined their hands, and there had been something about "my son, my best friend's motherless child," and he had found himself pledged to Martha, staring into her tear-wet, adolescent eyes.

He had always wanted to write. From earliest youth he had scribbled on any and every scrap of paper. He felt, perhaps wrongly, that he had a splendid gift to give to the world. And he lived in that future hour of recognition.

He had never been outside the valley. He had never seen beyond his narrow community. There had been little expansion of his own soul. And he had the happy faculty to realize his restriction. He was wedged in by stupid conventionalities. He had, he knew too poignantly, little to write about.

He had held tenaciously to his dream of ultimate freedom. He had heavily mortgaged the land. He knew, with almost mad complacence, that within a few years he would lose the far-stretching acres. And then would begin his pilgrimage to the world. The world he thirsted for, and from whose living pages he would transcribe.

Tonight he walked slowly back to the house. He began to hope that Martha had gone to bed. There was something about her of late that disturbed him. She was pale and unhappy and ailing. And wistful, too. And he would raise his head suddenly to find her sad eyes intent on his face as if there were something she wanted to tell him. It annoyed him, because it frightened him. He felt, somehow, responsible.

She had not gone to bed. She was sitting before the empty hearth, staring unseeingly at the darkened bricks. She did not turn to look at him. She held out her hand.

He went slowly to her with calm indifference.

She was only a child, and she knew, vaguely, that she had never really pleased him. She had so little to give him, and now she felt that her sole gift would be unwanted.

He looked down at her, not unkindly, and put a gentle hand on her shoulder.

"I've been meaning to tell you," she said with difficulty, "the doctor—"

She faltered. His hand fell away. He was suddenly white and drawn.

"No," he said quietly, "no."

She was terror-stricken. "But why?"

"We've only the barest necessities. There's hardly enough for two."

She caught her one shred of courage. She was fighting for something bigger than herself. Something potent within her. She was fighting, with terrible strength, for life.

"It's because we've done nothing, either of us, about the farm. We've let it go to ruin. We've lived our days in laziness. Idled the hours. Why, ours is the finest land for miles. We must," she ended with quiet finality, "make it a paying farm for our child."

He did not answer her. He saw, very vividly, the approaching days. He would awaken at six to the smell of fried food and Martha's shrill voice. Then a long, hard morning in the field, and dinner. The field again, dragging, dulling hours, then merciful dusk, and supper. And when he could get out his paper and pen, they would dance before his eyes, and the only alternative, of course, would be bed.

Apathy dulled him. It was as if the strength of her words had crushed his spirit. He could not even cry out in protest. An inbred New England conscience compelled him to realize his duty. There was nothing beyond the impregnable wall of right.

He heard himself mumbling, "They've bound both my hands, the quick and the dead." His ironical laughter flooded the room. "Blessed be the ties that bind."

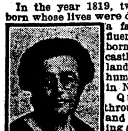
Willingness to Wait

A young farmer was urged to set out some apple trees. "No," said he, "they are too long growing, and I don't want to plant for other people." The young farmer's father was spoken to about it, but he, with better reason, alleged that apple trees were slow and life was fleeting. At last someone mentioned it to the old grandfather of the young farmer. He had nothing else to do—so he stuck in some trees. He lived long enough to drink barrels of cider made from the apples that grew on those trees.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

QUEEN VICTORIA
LYDIA E. PINKHAM

Two Famous Women Born the Same Year

In the year 1819, two babies were born whose lives were destined to have a far reaching influence. One was born in a stern castle of Old England, the other in a humble farmhouse in New England.



Queen Victoria through her wisdom and kindliness during a long and prosperous reign has become enthroned in the hearts of the British people. Lydia E. Pinkham through the merit of her Vegetable Compound has made her name a household word in many American homes.

One of the many women who praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is Mrs. Adolph Bratke of 4316 South 13th St., South Omaha, Nebr., who was in a rundown condition for four years before she tried the Compound. "I began to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound," she writes, "and I have felt my health steadily improving." Mrs. Bratke continued to take the Compound for a year and a half and at the end of that time she found herself in excellent health. "I am feeling fine now and do all my work myself," she wrote in her most recent letter. "I am the mother of six and manage an eight-room house without anybody to help."

A dead man is of as much use in the world as a lazy one—and he takes up less room.

PLAYING THE PART OF PEACEMAKER

By FRANK FILSON

(©, by W. G. Chapman.)

WHEN Uncle Will came back from the West at forty-five, with a wad of money, we were delighted that he should think of spending the winter in the old homstead where he had not put in an appearance for ten years.

"But what gets me," he said, "is the way you folks here quarrel. Seems to me as though you hadn't any time to do anything else, and liked it."

I flushed. "If you are referring to George Bailey, uncle," I began.

"Lydia," answered Uncle Will, "if you talk sassy like that you won't get any more candy from me. What do I care about George Bailey? He isn't half good enough for you, and I'm glad you had a falling out."

"He is!" I cried indignantly. "He's the finest boy in Surbiton." And then Uncle Will gave me one of his maddening smiles and walked away.

It was true enough what he had said, though. We did have trouble in Surbiton. It was what you call a spinsters' village, and everybody said I was a fool to let George go. But he humiliated me so, dancing with red-headed Miss Florence Smith twice that night, and only giving me eleven dances. And we had just become engaged, too.

Uncle Will was a Surbiton man. They said in his young days he had been engaged to Miss Barrett, the school teacher. If he had, nobody was the wiser. He and Miss Barrett greeted each other just as calmly as though they had always been acquaintances and there had never been anything else between them. And what puzzled me was how Uncle Will could want to put in so long a time at Surbiton, instead of making for the white lights of the city, with his wad to spend.

Now I come to my story. It was about three weeks after Uncle Will returned that Surbiton was electrified by an itinerant peddler who came along the street. Peddler is perhaps a wrong way of describing him, for he had nothing to sell. He drove a broken-down horse and sat inside a buggy with a closed top. When he reached Hi Perkins' vacant lot he unhitched the horse and turned it out to graze. Then he took down the top of the buggy and hoisted his sign:

WILLIAM ITT
International and Intercolonial
Peacemaker of America.

Naturally half the village was around Mr. Itt's wagon in about ten minutes, gaping.

"What's it mean?" asked Hi Perkins, who didn't like peddlers pitching on his lot, though he was too kind-hearted to shoo them away.

"I'm the international and intercolonial peacemaker," says Mr. Itt, who was a little, sandy, dried-up man. "I make peace. Bring on your quarrels. Now!"

"Why don't he try to make up between Jim Barnes and his wife?" shouted one of the wags. But Mr. Itt took a serious view of the situation.

"This ain't no joke, ladies and gents," he said. "It's a respectable perfession, mine is. It's a necessary one, too. There's far too much quarreling in these days. I made peace only last week between the mayor of Deedles and his lady, and the town's been clean of graft ever since. Now, ladies and gents, my fee is a dollar, and my tent's open by appointment at any hour after dark, when you can come in quietlike and nobody will see you."

Well, that raised a laugh, but, would you believe it, Sadie Roach, our maid, declared that she saw Mr. and Mrs. Barnes stealing away out of Mr. Itt's tent, looking as pleased as a courting couple the next morning. And as the days went by and Mr. Itt remained, it certainly seemed that an improvement had come to Surbiton. Folks who hadn't been on speaking terms for years began to say "Hello!" to each other, and spite fences were taken down, and nobody complained when the neighbors' chickens got into his garden any more.

Well, what happened next scared me. I was strolling near Mr. Itt's tent, just by chance, you understand, when the little man came out and accosted me.

"Mademoiselle," he said, executing a bow—for that is the only word suitable for the absurd little bob he made, "can I be of service to you?"

My heart went into my mouth and I couldn't find any words with which to answer him.

"If you was to come to my tent about eight o'clock tonight," said Mr. Itt, "I might be able to help you know yourself. You have trouble in your heart, mademoiselle. I can trace it in the third line of your right hand, running from the Mount of Hercules to the Oasis of Luna."

And with these enigmatical words he beat a retreat into his tent, leaving me decidedly annoyed and a little humiliated.

I knew he couldn't possibly have heard about me and George, because our engagement had been kept a profound secret outside the family, and only the relations and the servants knew about it, and they wouldn't have breathed a word to anybody. However, I began to get piqued by Mr. Itt's words, and about eight o'clock that night, finding myself—quite by chance, you understand—in the vicinity of Mr. Itt's tent, I thought I would drop in to see whether there really was anything in what he had said about the Mount of Hercules.

Though it had begun to dawn on me that I had had my hands in my muff and that he hadn't seen them at all.

Mr. Itt seemed to have been waiting for me, for hardly had I drawn near his tent when he was outside, seizing me by the hands.

"You have come," he said. "I am glad you have come. Mademoiselle, you remind me of my dear friend his excellency Ching Foo, the grand vizier of Tartary, who had a fearful quarrel with his wife last week over the spending money. He came to me.

"'Mr. Itt,' he said, 'I have had a row with my wife and I wish I were dead. She wants a hundred yen a week to buy her own clothes with. What would you do?'

"'Give her two hundred,' I answered, and he saw the justice of it and went away happy. They're reconciled now."

Mr. Itt's views seemed sensible to me, but all the while he was repeating this absurd patter he kept glancing back nervously over his shoulder, as though he were expecting somebody. And as he ended he made an abrupt little dive into the tent and pulled the flap to. I heard a murmur of voices inside, and I wondered whether I had happened along when another couple was there.

And I was still wondering when, to my amazement, somebody put his hands over my eyes.

And now my heart began to pit-a-pat. Yes, it was George.

"I'm so sorry, sweetheart," he said. "I see how wrong I was to dance twice with Florence Smith. I'll never look at her again. Mr. Itt persuaded me that I had been a fool. Won't you forgive me, dearest?"

"Well, I was considerably hurt, but then I felt something being squeezed over my finger, and it felt like that half-hoop of diamonds, which I had loved so much, and which I had intended to have enlarged the day before I gave it back to George. So what could I do?"

We had the happiest time there, and then we decided that we ought to thank Mr. Itt. It seemed too wonderful to be true. So we went up to the tent and called.

Mr. Itt seemed to be scolding somebody, I thought, and he didn't hear my voice. I wanted to thank him and so I opened the tent door. And who do you think were inside? Uncle Will and Miss Barrett.

Uncle Will was on his knees before her, and her face was as hard as stone. Just then Uncle Will saw us, and he sprang to his feet, looking rather foolish.

"Go away, you young vipers!" he bellowed. "What do you mean by intruding upon—why, it's little Lydia! And George!"

Somehow instinct told me just what to do at that moment. I went up to Miss Barrett and kissed her and placed her hands in Uncle Will's.

Suddenly Miss Barrett's face softened, and a minute later she was crying in Uncle Will's arms. Uncle Will said afterward that it must have been the force of our example. I think this was correct. But would you ever believe that Uncle Will had hired Mr. Itt for the performance? That's what Aunt Rose Barrett Templeton says. And Uncle Will doesn't deny it. He says he's got such a good wife he doesn't want to remember the trouble he had in getting her.

Strangely enough, George said something like that to me yesterday.

Try Engineer's Method for Solving Problems

Every business executive will find something of value in certain basic factors which are applied to engineering. Gerard Swope, president of the General Electric company, says in Forbes Magazine:

"We must use analytical processes of thought to examine conditions before we can be assured of reaching correct conclusions; and the engineer has been trained to make his analysis as a precedent to reaching a correct solution. The application of the word 'engineering' to its present use is very broad, but its sense remains the same. Engineering has become a comprehensive term which covers a constant search for better methods, whether they concern short cuts in mental processes, critical analyses, the introduction of automatic machinery in labor-saving devices, or any other constructive effort. It also points out to a man a definite goal, shows him how to shape his efforts, and marks the way by which he may attain his object.

"If we divide our problems into successive steps as an engineer would do, conditions are immediately clarified. An engineer studies the object to be achieved, analyzes his materials, and then determines how they can be used most economically and to the best advantage. Most problems may be divided into three parts, generally speaking. First, a correct analysis and the drawing of conclusions as to the right course of action; second, the decision as to the most advantageous manner of carrying it out; and third, the independence and courage necessary to follow the outlined course."

72 Per Cent Of Patrons Deliver Over 100 Pounds Of Butterfat

$12,327.24 Is The Actual Amount Paid Out To Patrons For Butterfat In June

Following is a list of names of patrons that delivered more than 100 pounds of butterfat for the month of June 1926. Seventy-Two per cent of our patrons delivered more than 100 pounds which is the best showing that has been done in the history of the Holt Creamery.

Actual amount paid out for butterfat for month of June is $12,327.24. C. A. Davis tops the list without any difficulty, his nearest rival having 51 pounds less. The names below are listed according to amount each one delivered. It is no small job to compile these figures, especially so when you have to add every delivery made by patrons receiving cash payment. I am late in getting this report out but nevertheless I know you will appreciate that it is better to be late than not to publish this report.

Patrons should study this report, save it from month to month and year to year. Compare this month with same month last year, at all times knowing the number of cows you had last year which gives you an idea of how much better your cows are doing. If they are not doing as well be sure and find out why.

Do not guess but have your cows tested chances are that you will be very much surprised as to which is your best cows.

Immediately after milk is separated, take cream and set in a pail of cold water, stir cream for a few minutes while cooling. This will get the animal heat out quickly and is very important in getting a Land O' Lakes flavor, which must be free from any off flavor whatsoever. We could give you Land O' Lakes grade for all your cream but if it is not such a grade we will take a loss when our butter returns comes back.

There are times some of the patrons believe they are entitled to an x when all we can give them is a first grade and yet this patron, I know fully well, believes that his cream should have been marked an x and that we did it for some other purpose. I have always tried to treat them all alike, and shall continue to do so. It is the only way to success.

Injured When Team Runaway

Olaf Tveit of Golden Valley was hurt quite badly last Thursday when his team ran away. He had just hitched up a span of young hores to a disc and was out on the field to do some work when one of the horses kicked over the tug and started to rear up on his hind feet. Mr. Tveit went up to the horsee head and was trying to quiten then down when they made a quick start causing him to loose his holt on the bridal and he fell down and was tramped on and run over by the disc. He was not cut up so badly on his body as he had heavy clothes on but he received some deep cuts obout the head.

He was at once rushed to the Grygla hospital where he is improving slowly.

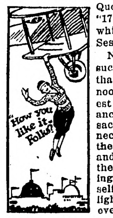
WORLD'S TWO GREATEST THRILLERS COMING

The two biggest thrillers in the world of entertainment in 1926 will be features of the great Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Dairy Exposition, Twin Cities, September 4 to 11—the internationally-famous Gladys Roy, new Queen of the Air, from California; and "1776", the mammoth fireworks spectacle which is being staged by the Philadelphia Sesquicentennial.



"How you like it, Folks?"

1776
"TO ARMS! TO ARMS"

Never in the history of aviation has such a daring program been planned as that in which Miss Roy will appear afternoon and evening at the "World's Greatest State Fair." In her feature appearance each day Miss Roy will put a black sack over her head, padlock it at the neck, and, rising in her plane, will walk the wings of her ship, stand on her head, and climb from one end to the other of the flying craft. Hanging from the landing gear of the plane, she will draw herself up between the wheels as the ship lights, one of the most dangerous stunts ever essayed by any aerial acrobat.

All of the thrilling episodes in the Revolution for American Independence will be dramatized in vivid fashion in the great fireworks spectacle "1776", each evening of the fair. The famous ride of Paul Revere, the battle of Concord and Lexington, the Boston Tea Party, the making of the first flag by Betsy Ross, and a score of other stirring events in early American history, will be staged before a gigantic scenic background more than 400 feet long. The show will end with the battle of Yorktown, and depict the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to General Washington.

BEFORE HER BABY CAME

Used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Adkins, Texas.—"Before my baby came I was so weak I had to stay in bed most of the time until I began taking Lydia E. Pinkhams Vegetable Compound. My mother-in-law, who is a midwife, told me it was all foolishness for me to stay in bed. She told me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it would help me. She handed me one of your little books and I read it and was interested in it. I went to a drug-store that night and got a bottle of your wonderful medicine. I took it until the baby was born and was able to be up and do my work. Baby is 4½ months old now and weighs 14 pounds. I have plenty of milk for her and she gains steadily. I recommend it. I am willing to answer letters and will do anything I can for any woman, for I know how I suffered."—Mrs. A. H. Tschirhart, R. No. 2, Box 39, Adkins, Texas.

Close to the deep, dark pool in which he and the Willow had disported so often Baree, too, had stopped. He could hear the rippling of water, and his eyes shone with a gleaming fire as he quested for Nepeese. He expected to see her there, her slim white body shimmering in some dark shadow of overhanging spruce, or gleaming suddenly white as snow in one of the warm plashes of sunlight. His eyes sought out their old hiding places; the great split rock on the other side, the shelving banks under which they used to dive like otter, the spruce boughs that dipped down to the surface, and in the midst of which the Willow loved to screen her naked body while he searched the pool for her. And at last the realization was borne upon him that she was not there, that he had still farther to go.

He went on to the tepee. The little open space in which they had built their hidden wigwam was flooded with sunshine that came through a break in the forest to the west. The tepee was still there. It did not seem very much changed to Baree. And rising from the ground in front of the tepee was what had come to him faintly on the still air—the smoke of a small fire. Over that fire was bending a person, and it did not strike Baree as amazing, or at all unexpected, that this person should have two great shining braids down her back. He whined, and at his whine the Person grew a little rigid, and turned slowly.

Even then it seemed quite the most natural thing in the world that it should be Nepeese, and none other. He had lost her yesterday. Today he had found her. And in answer to his whine there came a sobbing cry straight out of the soul of the Willow.

* * * * * * * *

Carvel found them there a few minutes later, the dog's head hugged close up against the Willow's breast, and the Willow was crying—crying like a little child, her face hidden from him on Baree's neck. He did not interrupt them, but waited; and as he waited something in the sobbing voice and the stillness of the forest seemed to whisper to him a bit of the story of the burned cabin and the two graves, and the meaning of the Call that had come to Baree from out of the south.

Chapter XVII

That night there was a new campfire in the open. It was not a small fire, built with the fear that other eyes might see it, but a fire that sent its flames high. In the glow of it stood Carvel. And as the fire had changed from that small smoldering heap over which the Willow had cooked dinner, so Carvel, the officially dead outlaw, had changed. The beard was gone from his face; he had thrown off his caribou-skin coat; his sleeves were rolled up to the elbows, and there was a wild flush in his face that was not altogether the tanning of wind and sun and storm, and a glow in his eyes that had not been there for five years, perhaps never before. His eyes were on Nepeese. She sat in the firelight, leaning a little toward the blaze, her wonderful hair glowing warmly in the flash of it. Carvel did not move while she was in that attitude. He seemed scarcely to breathe. The glow in his eyes grew deeper—the worship of a man for a woman. Suddenly Nepeese turned and caught him before he could turn his gaze. There was nothing to hide in her own eyes. Like her face, they were flushed with a new hope and a new gladness. Carvel sat down beside her on the birch log, and in his hand he took one of her thick braids and crumpled it as he talked. At their feet, watching them, lay Baree.

"Tomorrow or the next day I am going to Lac Bain," he said, a hard and bitter note back of the gentle worship of his voice. "I will not come back until I have—killed him."

The Willow looked straight into the fire. For a time there was a silence broken only by the crackling of the flames, and in that silence Carvel's fingers weaved in and out of the silken strands of the Willow's hair. His thoughts flashed back. What a chance he had missed that day on Bush McTaggart's trap-line—if he had only known! His jaws set hard as he saw in the red-hot heart of the fire the mental pictures of the day when the Factor from Lac Bain had killed Pierrot. She had told him the whole story. Her flight. Her plunge to what she had thought was certain death in the icy torrent of the chasm. Her miraculous escape from the waters—and how she was discovered, nearly dead, by Tuboa, the toothless old Cree whom Pierrot out of pity had allowed to hunt in part of his domain. He felt within himself the tragedy and the horror of the one terrible hour in which the sun had gone out of the world for the Willow, and in the flames he could see faithful old Tuboa as he called on his last strength to bear Nepeese over the long miles that lay between the chasm and his cabin; he caught shifting visions of the weeks that followed in that cabin, weeks of hunger and of intense cold in which the Willow's life hung by a single thread. And at last, when the snows were deepest, Tuboa had died. Carvel's fingers clenched in the strands of the Willow's braid. A deep breath rose out of his chest, and he said, staring deep into the fire:

"Tomorrow I will go to Lac Bain."

For a moment Nepeese did not answer. She, too, was looking into the fire. Then she said:

"Tuboa meant to kill him when the spring came, and he could travel. When Tuboa died I knew that it was I who must kill him. So I came, with Tuboa's gun. It was fresh loaded—yesterday. And—M'sieu Jeem"—she looked up at him, a triumphant glow in her eyes as she added in a whisper—"You will not go to Lac Bain. I have sent a messenger."

"A messenger?"

"Yes, Ookimow Jeem—a messenger. Two days ago. I sent word that I had not died, but was here—waiting for him—and that I would be Iskwao now, his wife. Oo-oo, he will come, Ookimaw Jeem—he will come fast. And you shall not kill him. Non!" She smiled into his face, and the throb of Carvel's heart was like a dream. "The gun is loaded," she said softly. "I will shoot."

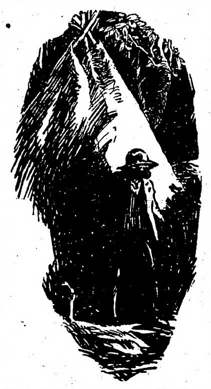
"Two days ago," said Carvel. "And from Lac Bain it is—"

"He will be here tomorrow," Nepeese answered him. "Tomorrow, as the sun goes down, he will enter the clearing. I know. My blood has been singing it all day. Tomorrow—tomorrow—for he will travel fast, Ookimow Jeem. Yes, he will come fast."

Carvel had bent his head. The soft tresses gripped in his fingers were crushed to his lips. The Willow, looking again into the fire, did not see. But she felt—and her soul was beating like the wings of a bird.

"Ookimow Jeem," she whispered—a breath, a flutter of the lips so soft that Carvel heard no sound.

If old Tuboa had been there that night it is possible he would have read strange warnings in the winds that whispered now and then softly in the tree-tops. It was such a night; a night when the Red Gods whisper among themselves, a carnival of glory in which even the dipping shadows and the high stars seemed to quiver with the life of a potent language. It is barely possible that old Tuboa, with his ninety years behind him, would have learned something, or that at least he would have suspected a thing which Carvel in his youth and confidence did not see. Tomorrow—he will come tomorrow! The Willow, exultant, had said that. But to old Tuboa the trees might have whispered, why not tonight?



Then, Still Very Quietly, He Drew Aside the Flap.

It was midnight when the big moon stood full above the little open in the forest. In the tepee the Willow was sleeping. In the balsam shadow back from the fire slept Baree, and still farther back in the edge of a spruce thicket slept Carvel. Dog and man were tired. They had traveled far and fast that day, and they heard no sound.

But they had traveled neither so far nor so fast as Bush McTaggart. Between sunrise and midnight he had come forty miles when he strode out into the clearing where Pierrot's cabin had stood. Twice from the edge of the forest he had called; and now, when he found no answer, he stood under the light of the moon and listened. Nepeese was to be here—waiting. He was tired, but exhaustion could not still the fire that burned in his blood. It had been blazing all day, and now—so near its realization and its triumph—the old passion was like a drunkening wine in his veins. Some where, near where he stood, Nepeese was waiting for him, waiting for him. Once again he called, his heart beating in a fierce anticipation as he listened. There was no answer. And then for a thrilling instant his breath stopped. He sniffed the air—and there came to him faintly the smell of smoke.

With the first instinct of the forest man he fronted the wind that was but a faint breath under the starlit skies. He did not call again, but hastened across the clearing. Nepeese was off there—somewhere—sleeping beside her fire, and out of him there rose a low cry of exultation. He came to the edge of the forest; chance directed his steps to the overgrown trail; he followed it, and the smoke smell came stronger to his nostrils.

It was the forest man's instinct, too, that added the element of caution to his advance. That, and the utter stillness of the night. He broke no sticks under his feet. He disturbed the brush so quietly that it made no sound. When he came at last to the little open where Carvel's fire was still sending a spiral of spruce-scented smoke up into the air it was with a stealth that failed even to rouse Baree. Perhaps, deep down in him, there smoldered an old suspicion; perhaps it was because he wanted to come to her while she was sleeping. The sight of the tepee made his heart throb faster. It was light as day where it stood in the moonlight, and he saw hanging outside it a few bits of woman's apparel. He advanced soft-footed as a fox and stood a moment later with his hand on the cloth flap at the wigwam door, his head bent forward to catch the merest breath of sound. He could hear her breathing. For an instant his face turned so that the moonlight struck his eyes. They were aflame with a mad fire. Then, still very quietly, he drew aside the flap at the door.

It could not have been sound that roused Baree, hidden in the black balsam shadow a dozen paces away. Perhaps it was scent. His nostrils twitched first; then he awoke. For a few seconds his eyes glared at the bent figure in the tepee door. He knew that it was not Carvel. The old smell—the man-beast's smell, filled his nostrils like a hated poison. He sprang to his feet and stood with his lips snarling back slowly from his long fangs. McTaggart had disappeared. From inside the tepee there came a sound; a sudden movement of bodies, a startled ejaculation of one awakening from sleep—and then a cry, a low, half-smothered, frightened cry, and in response to that cry Baree shot out from under the balsam with a sound in his throat that had in it the note of death.

* * * * * * *

In the edge of the spruce thicket Carvel rolled uneasily. Strange sounds were rousing him, cries that in his exhaustion came to him as if in a dream. At last he sat up, and then in sudden horror leaped to his feet and rushed toward the tepee. Nepeese was in the open, crying the name she had given him — "Ookimow Jeem — Ookimow — Jeem—Ookimow Jeem—" She was standing there white and slim, her eyes with the blaze of the stars in them, and when she saw Carvel she flung out her arms to him, still crying:

"Ookimow Jeem—Oo-oo, Ookimow Jeem—"

In the tepee he heard the rage of a beast, the moaning cries of a man. He forgot that it was only last night he had come, and with a cry he swept the Willow to his breast, and the Willow's arms tightened around his neck as she moaned:

"Ookimow Jeem—it is the man-beast—in there! It is the man-beast from Lac Bain—and Baree—"

Truth flashed upon Carvel, and he caught Nepeese up in his arms and ran away with her from the sounds that had grown sickening and horrible. In the spruce thicket he put her feet once more to the ground. Her arms were still tight around his neck; he felt the wild terror of her body as it throbbed against him; her breath was sobbing, and her eyes were on his face. He drew her closer, and suddenly he crushed his face down close against hers and felt for an instant the warm thrill of her lips against his own. And he heard the whisper, soft and trembling:

"Ooo-oo, Ookimow Jeem—"

When Carvel returned to the fire, alone, his Colt in his hand, Baree was in front of the tepee waiting for him.

Carvel picked up a burning brand and entered the wigwam. When he came out his face was white. He tossed the brand in the fire and went back to Nepeese. He had wrapped her in his blankets, and now he knelt down beside her and put his arms about her.

"He is dead, Nepeese."

"Dead Ookimow Jeem?"

"Yes. Baree killed him."

She did not seem to breathe. Gently, with his lips in her hair, Carvel whispered his plans for their paradise.

"No one will know, my sweetheart. Tonight I will bury him and burn the tepee. Tomorrow we will start for Nelson House, where there is a Missioner. And after that—we will come back—and I will build a new cabin where the old one burned. Do you love me, ka sakahet?"

"Oui—yes—Ookimow Jeem—I love you—"

Suddenly there came an interruption. Baree at last was giving his cry of triumph. It rose to the stars; it wailed over the roofs of the forests and filled the quiet skies—a wolfish howl of exultation, of achievement, of vengeance fulfilled. Its echoes died slowly away, and silence came again. A great peace whispered in the soft breath of the tree tops. Out of the north came the mating call of a loon about Carvel's shoulders the Willow's arms crept closer. And Carvel, out of his heart, thanked God.

[THE END.]

Probable Reason

"Well! well! Look at that fellow running and turning his head first one way, then the other, as he flees!" exclaimed a guest. "What do you suppose he is doing that for?"

"Not knowing the gent, can't say for certain," replied the landlord of the tavern at Peeweecuddyhump, "but prob'ly it is b'cuz he ain't able to turn it both ways at once."—Kansas City Times.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

(©, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

Look Not Upon His Stature

One of my young friends writes me about a problem which, though really old, is ever new to the one into whose life it comes.

She had been undecided between two young men. Then suddenly her doubts cleared and she knew.

The good looking one of more prepossessing appearance had revealed himself as selfish and egotistical. He told her he loved her, but she discovered he could love no one better than he loved himself.

And this revelation helped her, she says, to appreciate the real value of the other man whose fine character and real devotion had earned her admiration and respect, and now she knew her love.

She loves him in spite of his unimpressive manner, in spite of his plainness, in spite of the fact that he is half a head shorter than she.

She knows that his modesty cloaks not only an admirable character, but a mental calibre which must work its way to success. Indeed, she says, he has already known more success than his flashing and conceited rival.

But—"It's the impression he makes. He looks so insignificant, and my friends, thinking that I have not yet decided, do not hesitate to tell me so. Unfortunately I am tall, and this makes all the more conspicuous his small stature and—it is true—his insignificant appearance. My family and my friends say if I married him I would always be conscious of this and would not be happy. Do you think I am making a mistake?"

No!

With all my heart I say to you and to all other girls whose better sense may be waging a like battle with superficiality and false standards—No! Your only mistake is in weighing in the same scales with honor, manliness, worth and true devotion such flimflam as the impressiveness of a man's appearance or the manner of a cavalier.

Certainly, all other things being equal, it would be very nice if we could all be Dianas or Apollo Belvederes. But to choose between such and substantial things!

You are not going to live with an appearance, but with another character and heart. These are the substance that will control, in a great measure, your future happiness. Therefore you must think of them—not of the shell.

Good looks would make a poor substitute for a mentality to pal with yours. If you are at all exacting, they would hardly satisfy your longing for companionship; and as a steady and exclusive diet they are quite likely to pall.

A handsome head will not take the place of the heart that would cherish you or the character that would provide for you and sustain and comfort you in dark as well as in sunny days.

And when you are married a devoted glance from your husband is worth more than his ability to charm other men's wives. Then it is his real self and his attitude to your real self that will count—nothing more.

You are marrying for your happiness—not to impress your friends.

Take the real man who has inspired your love, little girl, and much happiness to you!

Take Tip From That Sun Glass

There is a sunglass in one of the laboratories at Washington which measures about three feet across. When properly focused it concentrates the sun's rays at a single spot behind it that is better than the flame of a blowtorch. It has been impossible to measure the heat of these concentrated sun rays because it is so terrific that it melts all instruments.

You and I can stand out in the sunshine at Washington without melting, yet neither of us would last long under that sunglass! The difference is in concentration.

Some of us are like the unconcentrated sun rays. We may throw a warmth into our problems of life without materially affecting them.

There is the woman—and her name is legion—who uses up a tremendous amount of energy but accomplishes nothing because she tries to do many things, or goes at many things, at once, without concentrating on anything. She gives herself lavishly, but she spreads her energies to such an extent that they are too thin to be effective.

Some very effective people do a great many things, but they do them one at a time, concentrating, focusing all their rays of activity at once on whatever they desire to accomplish. And so, like the sunglass, they melt, one by one, the problems that confront them.

And as the huge burning glass draws a powerful heat from mere sun rays, so concentration multiplies our power many, many times, and gives us the most for the expenditure of our energies.

Prejudice

We hate some persons because we do not know them; and we will not know them because we hate them. The friendships that succeed to such aversions are usually firm; for those qualities must be sterling that could not only gain our hearts but conquer our prejudices.—Colton.

Indians Consume Ancestors' Bones

Eating the bones of ancestors is one of the strange customs of Indian tribes in the wilds of Brazil. From 15 to 20 years after burial, the bones are disinterred, pounded to powder and mixed with the drink taken at certain festivals, apparently with the idea that the souls and power of the ancestors will be communicated to the bodies of the descendants.

The men of these tribes are much finer in physique and grace of figure than the women, who are likely to be stumpy and small, Dr. William Montgomery McGovern, English traveler and explorer, is quoted in an interview published by the New York World. Deformed persons, however, are almost unknown. They are killed at birth, as also are twins, who are regarded as "evil things."

Doctor McGovern says he found the native diet of monkey and red ants very nice, indeed. Ants taste like crisp bacon, while monkey is a cross between pork and chicken.

Afraid of Old Wine

There are several gallons of wine in the city of Speyer, in the Rhine, so old and rare that nobody wants to run the risk of taking a drink of it. The oldest vintage in the world is on exhibition in the Speyer "wine museum," which contains everything pertaining to the wine industry. The wine is in an old Roman flask, which was dug up recently. It is 1,600 years old.

Passing of the Horse

Unostentatiously and little by little, the horse has been superseded by the motor until now there are only 4,152,000 more horses on American farms than there were in 1900.

AFTER THE RAILROAD WRECK

By ARTHUR CLEVES

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

JIM DRISCOLL found himself upon his feet, staring at the wreck of the train in which he had been traveling. All about him lay the dead and injured, and the carriages, which were beginning to catch fire, illumined the night with a lurid glare.

It was in the middle of the mountain district of the East. Driscoll had left his little town in the Midwest to go to the great city. It was his first journey in ten years. A discovery of oil upon his property had given him the promise of wealth, and he had set out to negotiate with a company.

Jim Driscoll, at fifty, was reputed the crabbedest old man in Boxville. If Mary and he had had children he might have discovered that life is not wholly a vale of tears. As it was, he was a town character. He knew it, too; knew that Mary shrank from him and feared him, though loyalty kept her to him; knew that his presence anywhere chilled the mirth, that the children hated him, that his neighbors avoided him.

He gloried in it. He had the reputation of being a vindictive man, and he gloried in that. He was close-fisted, hard as nails, and he hugged his sinister reputation to his heart.

The wreck had come suddenly. It had unsettled him. Of course, he was not going to interest himself in any of the injured. That was not Driscoll's way. But the physical shakeup had unsettled the habits of years, and for the first time in his life Driscoll began to take stock of himself.

His thoughts were changed by hearing a child's cry at his side. Stooping down, he saw a pretty little girl of eight or nine years, lying beside the track. Near her lay the body of a man. He had been killed in the disaster, and the girl, who seemed only slightly injured, was stretching out her arms to him and sobbing.

Beneath his hard exterior Driscoll had a heart tender in one respect. He loved children. That was why he scowled at them, to hide his feelings. If Mary and he could have had a child like that!

He spoke gruffly to the little girl, but she did not seem to notice his presence. And at last, with a shrug of the shoulders, Driscoll turned his back to her.

He started away—not in the direction of the metropolis, however, but back toward his home. A new idea had come to him. He would pretend that he had been killed in the wreck, and return home secretly, to discover what people were saying about him. He anticipated the jeers, the scoffing and congratulations, and his own triumph when he suddenly appeared in the midst of them.

The news of the disaster had spread rapidly, and, five miles down the line, Driscoll passed a wrecking train, with a medical car attached. Behind it, along the wayside track, there came a man in a buggy, who pulled up his sweating steed.

"Have you seen the wreck?" he shouted.

"Yes," answered Driscoll. "I was aboard. My friend, Jim Driscoll, was killed, and that's enough for me. Are you a reporter?"

"Yes, I'm a newspaper man," answered the other. "Give me a short account while I rest my horse. Quick!"

"I will if you'll put Jim Driscoll down as dead," answered Driscoll. "Say Jim Driscoll of Boxville, Ill., was killed by breaking his neck, because I'm not a-going to break the news to his family."

The bargain was struck and Driscoll gave the other a five minutes' account of the wreck. Then he hurried along the line.

He caught a branch train at the junction, and finally, about eight o'clock the next evening, attired in a shabby suit which he purchased at a pawnbroker's, he made his way in the dark through the streets of Boxville. Nobody who passed in the gathering darkness recognized Driscoll in the shabby, slouching stranger.

He pushed open the garden gate and crept to the outside of the parlor window. Inside he saw a small crowd of neighbors, but his wife was not there.

Driscoll recognized him as the local druggist, with whom he had been on bad terms for years. He clenched his fists. He hated the man's hypocrisy even more than himself.

"Now there's many talks against Jim, but he wasn't such a bad fellow," broke in the shoemaker. He was a man named Austin, with whom Driscoll had had a feud of several months' standing, on account of a business misunderstanding. "When a man's cranky, folks make allowances for him. I tell you, a man who can keep the love of a woman like Mary Driscoll must have some good in him—it stands to reason."

"It's a pity there wasn't no children," sighed Miss Hemans, the sister of the butcher. "That's what ate into their hearts like acid. But I guess that if he lives, Mary Driscoll will be so overjoyed that life'll take on a happier look for her."

"No chance of his recovering, is there?" asked Austin.

"A small one," said the butcher. "The doc says that if he recovers consciousness he'll most likely get well. It seems there's a splinter of bone pressing on his brain, and they can't tell how much it's injured him. If he recovers consciousness, the brain's all right; if he don't—well, he won't, that's all."

"Did Mary Driscoll write that?" asked another.

"Sure. She wrote to Miss Hemans here."

Jim Driscoll was conscious of mingled emotions. The first was of shame and humiliation. Of all the neighbors gathered there, not one had a bad word for him. But the second was of disgust. Could it be possible that his wife had gone to the hospital and actually mistaken another man for himself?

Or was somebody lying? That was a more probable explanation. Of course! It was a lie. His impulse was to run into the room, but he restrained himself, and he heard another speaker say:

"I tell you, Miss Hemans, when I saw Mary Driscoll start off this morning, she looked actually pretty in that black dress of hers, in spite of her sorrow. She was crying, and she couldn't hide it, but she looked like a girl again. Sorrow seems to bring back the youth in some people."

"She's had sorrow enough," broke in the first sneering voice that Driscoll had heard. "Living with a man like Jim is enough to make any woman wish she was dead."

Driscoll knew the speaker. He was the cashier of the local bank, and about the only friend he had in Boxville. And the sudden realization of the fellow's treachery almost unnerved the watcher at the window.

He, Driscoll, had been so wrapped up in his hatred and moodiness that he had never been able to tell his true friends from the false ones. He had acted like a fool. An overwhelming sense of remorse came over him. If he could see Mary now, and tell her what a fool he had been!

And, unable longer to restrain himself, he sprang for the door, opened it, and rushed into the parlor.

"I'm here, and I've heard every word!" he shouted to the assembly. "You, Mr. Nevins—" he turned to the cashier—"were my best friend, and you can walk right out of my house and never come—"

"Well, Jim Driscoll was a good man in his way," said Miss Hemans, wiping her eyes.

They had not heard him! Nobody had heard or noticed him! And, even as he stood there, bewildered, Nevins walked straight into him—and through him!

In an instant Driscoll understood. He was dead! He had died in the collision, and he was in his own home in the spirit, while the mangled flesh lay—in the hospital, no doubt, where his patient wife was watching!

"I agree with you, Miss Hemans," the butcher answered.

Jim Driscoll turned slowly away, and, with the realization that his last chance to redeem his life was gone, an agonizing sense of hopelessness crushed him.

* * * * * * *

"Jim!"

Jim Driscoll opened his eyes and stared into his wife's face.

"Oh, thank God, Jim! You are conscious. You are going to get well. Jim, God has answered my prayers. I have prayed for you night and day these ten days past, and the doctor said if you know me again you would recover. Jim, my dear—Jim, Oh, my dear!"

And, kneeling at the bedside, she flung her arms round the injured man's neck.

"Jim, everyone is talking about it," she said later.

"About what?" whispered Driscoll feebly.

"The little girl in the next bed—look at her, Jim! Don't you remember? You pulled her from beneath the car which had fallen on her father and killed him. Nobody knows how you freed her, but it fell back on your head and injured you terribly. And, Jim—"

Driscoll could read the hope in his wife's eyes.

"Yes, my dear," he answered, patting her hand. "If you like, Mary."

"You'll adopt her, Jim? She has nobody in the world."

And that time Mary Driscoll read the answer in his.

Supply of Air Seems Not Vital to Turtle

Of all air-breathing animals, the turtle seems to have the best claim to be the champion submarine. Prof. G. H. Parker of Harvard university, in a report to the Boston Society of Natural History, tells of a water tortoise that submerged itself and stayed under water for ten solid hours. However, when other tortoises were imprisoned in wire cages under water they gave out in only about an hour. Professor Parker is of the opinion that a great deal depends on whether the tortoise is "holding his breath" by his own volition. The caged tortoises struggled to find a way out of their prison, and thus probably used up their reserve oxygen supplies much more rapidly than the quiescent animal that had made the dive voluntarily. Alligators were found to survive under water for as much as six hours, and caymans, which are alligatorlike reptiles from Central America, could hold out for two hours. This ability to live for long periods under water, without a renewal of the air supply, has an important relationship to the long submergence periods during hibernation, Professor Parker says.

1 in every 4

DURING the first six months of 1926 one in every four buyers of new automobiles bought a General Motors car. During 1925 the proportion was about one in five. During 1924 it was one in six. This steady addition of new friends for the products of General Motors has a double significance.

1. It is proof that the grouping of strong companies in one big family is economically sound. Large scale operations do make possible important economies; and these economies do benefit the buyer, in greater value. The public has recognized this principle and profited by it.

2. Increased public patronage involves increased obligation. General Motors is directly responsible for the welfare of its 152,000 employees and their families, its 20,000 dealers, and indirectly for the six thousand companies which furnish it with supplies and materials — at least a million men, women and children to whom its public good is a very personal concern.

As the volume of production increases there must be a corresponding increase in the values offered. The new series of cars just presented does embody larger values; it is a direct reflection of the fact that more than 1,075,000 General Motors cars were sold at retail during the year just closed. The added quality has been built in where its presence counts most in comfort and safety and long life.

With great pride we invite you to inspect these new General Motors cars.

Premiums for Babies

As French babies become scarcer and scarcer the governmental desire to increase the population grows stronger and stronger. A law has just gone into effect substantially increasing the awards portioned out to the parents whose progeny are many.

Families with four children or more under the age of thirteen are allowed 360 francs annually for each child after the third. Provision is also made for widows and widowers. A widow with five children would receive under the new regulations 1,800 francs, or $360, according to pre-war standards.

Has to Pile It On

The new dial system which the telephone company has installed in New York city requires the subscriber to get his own numbers by means of moving the dial. A friend tells us that the only way he can get a number is by flashing the operator and telling her that both his arms are broken, that he has St. Vitus' dance, that he is blind, and will throw himself out of the window if she refuses help.—The Outlook.

Danger of Typhoid in Vacation Season

The increase in the prevalence of typhoid fever is often directly proportional to the increase in touring by motor car, according to a statement issued by the Illinois department of public health.

In 1925, the disease spread into eight states from polluted drinking water of one small town in Indiana. Six cases in Illinois were traced to this source.

The motor car takes large numbers of people from their own protected community into others in which the sanitary conditions are not safe. Every person must take the responsibility for the safety of his own food and water at such a time.

The tourist season is open. It would be well for the public to remember that vaccination protects every one, while cleanliness and sanitation, equally protective, are not always practiced by others.—Hygeia Magazine.

By Way of Explanation

After a long absence she arrived home with the shopping.

"Where have you been all this time?" asked her mother severely.

"I was playing with Joan," was the explanation.

"I thought I told you to hurry back?"

"Why mother," was Molly's aggrieved reply, "I did hurry back like anything. I met Joan going. You didn't tell me to hurry going."

Magnetism

Faraday demonstrated in 1845 that all substances, even the gases, are either attracted or repelled by a sufficiently powerful magnetic pole. Practically, however, the metals responsive to magnetism are the three which, with their alloys, comprise the ferromagnetic group. These are iron, nickel and cobalt. Certain other combinations of metals will respond to the magnet. Thus there was discovered in 1902 an alloy—Heusler's alloy—which is comprised of copper, aluminum and manganese, and which is said to be not greatly inferior to iron in its capacity for being magnetized.

Early Baseball

The first baseball "diamond" was square instead of a diamond as used now. The bases were wooden posts that stood out of the ground 4 feet. The sides were made up of from 10 to 14 players. The rule of play was, one out all out. The score was 100 tallies up. The side first scoring 100 runs was the winner.

Regulation - - Makes Utility Competition Unnecessary

Because of the unusually large investment necessary to provide Light and Power Service to a community, duplications of Services—competition— is an economic waste.

Merchandise is sold at a price fixed by the dealer. He wants to make a profiit but must make his prices low enough to bring trade, or his competitor may get the business. Competition is therefere the governing foctor where the investment is not large and the turnover is rapid. Power and Light Service requires an enormous investment and the turnover is very slow, only about once in five years.

As a substitute for competition, legislatures have set up a rate regulation to keep public utilities' prices at a fair level. In some states this is done by commission, and in others, by city council. The ideal rate which these bodies seek is one which keeps the price for service as low as possible, yet allows the utility to pay its taxes, operating expenses, and a fair return on the actual value of the property used in giving service.

Regulation makes unnecessary the economic waste of duplication of service. It protects the public served and the capital invested, and so preserves to the public at large, the money that would be tied up by competitive investment.

NEW SERIAL STORY STARTING TODAY

The opening installment of Harold MacGrath's "The Man With Three Names" is printed in this issue. This is an exciting, intriguing tale of a young newspaper editor who makes a bitter enemy of the father of the woman he has set out to win. Both men are bull-headed, but the girl is—different. Something is bound to happen—and it does.

P. L. Anderson, Leo Horien, and Geo. Fricker made a business trip to Strathcona on Tuesday for some boiler repairs. On the way home they called on Arvid Carlson at Middle River.

Svenke Svenkeson started out with his threshing outfit from here on Monday. The first job he threshed this year was for J. Nelson. From there he went and threshed for Leonard Swan.

Nineteen years and one month of continuous service marks the record for the steam boiler at the Holt Farmers Creamery here without having any boiler work done to it. On Tuesday a flue sprung a leak which was so big that a new flue had to be put in which was the first repairs since the boiler was installed.

> They say—the old wives—that the soul of a Galahad will never take wing because, on the day of his physical death, the white soul of him broke into infinitesimal pieces. And they proceed to add another amazing fact: that these floating particles find lodgment in the hearts of young men, die there, or grow ripely according to the quality of the soil. This remarkable information clears up a lot of fog. One understands now why Youth steps forward so confidently and bravely to admonish a naughty world. 'Tis the leaven of Sir Galahad. Crusaders are unique in that they attack an ordinary goal in an extraordinary manner, so differently from the ordinary man's way that they become the object of the ordinary man's derision. No ordinary methods for the hero of this novel. It being inconvenient to use his real name, he adopted the customary expedient of assuming an alias—three of them, in fact. And what a story it makes!

Brandon Cathewe.

Once upon a time there lay at Liverpool a great and seemly ship. A young man, sartorially correct from his tan shoes to the panama on his perfectly modeled head, looked over her rail. Suddenly he became conscious of the odor of violets. It came from behind; so he turned his head.

Supposing your consciousness had been filled for hours with the beauty of a woman's face. Say that you had seen it but once for the duration of a dinner hour, at a table half way across the huge dining-room of the Savoy, and you knew that you would never forget it.

Supposing you had built an airy romance during that hour; an adventure wherein you rescued her from an unknown danger, fell in love with her and married her. Supposing you had been all alone in mighty London that night, with no place to go, with a heart which was heavy with bitterness because fate had dealt you marked cards in the game of life and cheated you abominably. And then, by a mere twist of the head, to see that face again but three spans away from yours!

Some men are fortunate; they know exactly what they want the moment they see it. Instantly this young man knew that one of life's great problems was solved. This was The Girl. Somewhere, somehow, he was going to meet her.

She was lovely. That was the word. He knew that lovely was a universe all by itself; for it embodied beauty and intellect, valor and tenderness, youth and purity.

The westering sun was in her eyes; thus, she was unconscious of the amazed scrutiny of the young man in front. She saw only a nebulous shadow. Immediately he called her the girl with the golden eyes.

This, however, was only a flight of poetical fancy. As a matter of fact, her eyes were intensely blue; but shooting out from the pupil to the rim of the iris were fine little threads of gold such as one sees in lapis lazuli.

The young man had no plan regarding his future procedure; he would need an hour or two of solitude for the formation of this. He was going to marry her in the end; that much was definitely settled. That she might have her own views on the subject was of no vital importance.

He hurried off to his first-class cabin, stowed his luggage, changed linen; then, a straw suitcase under his arm, took up his quarters in the steerage.

For he had work to do, serious work. He could have lived like the other first-class passengers, in idleness and luxury; but he was always in earnest, whether he played or worked, as will be seen.

For six days he was determined to live among the steerage passengers. To acquire the material he needed necessitated contact, not casual observation.

That night as he leaned against the rail—a thousand ineffectual plans having been scrutinized and rejected—he permitted a whimsical idea to enter his head. He raised his face toward the summer moon and laughed.

Why not? To approach the affair from a novel and unexpected angle; no winding in and out, no foreground to traverse with hesitant step. To take the plunge without bothering to feel the water with his fingers. The idea appealed to all that was romantic in him.

Her name was Elizabeth Mansfield, and they probably called her Betty. She was also the daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield. That put a double wall around her, millions and social prestige; tremendous obstacles which should have frightened him and chilled his ardor, whereas they but filled him with elation.

This young man was a crusader, with an ideal quite as lofty as that of Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless. He did not sally forth joyously with chanting and banners; he would not have gone forth at all but for the white honesty of his soul. He had inherited this obligation; it had been thrust upon him without asking his leave. He was a Crusader by force of circumstance.

As he climbed into his bunk there was but one idea in his head—to carry the outpost, her father, by storm. Two things were possible; either Mansfield would listen or he would call for a deck steward. Anyhow, to put it to the touch!

* * * * * * *

Dunleigh Mansfield might have passed for an elderly beau in a Pinero drama; a fine, courtly figure of a man, with a cold, hawklike countenance, quite handsome, with scarcely a gray hair in his head, though he was fifty.

He was standing alone, that sunny morning, in the corner where the cross-rail joins the port.

"Mr. Mansfield?"

The iron magnate turned. He saw a hatless young man in a white cotton shirt, open at the throat, shiny blue serge trousers that bagged at the knees, and a pair of soiled tennis shoes.

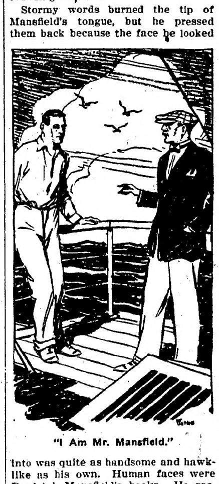
"I am Mr. Mansfield"—coldly.

"I wish the honor of paying court to your daughter."

Mansfield was not quite sure he had heard aright. "I beg your pardon?"

The young man repeated his astounding request.

Stormy words burned the tip of Mansfield's tongue, but he pressed them back because the face he looked into was quite as handsome and hawk-like as his own. Human faces were Dunleigh Mansfield's books. He recognized this type; the brow and eye of a dreamer, the nose and jaw of a fighting man.



"I Am Mr. Mansfield."

But Betty?—he asked the honor to pay court to Betty? The infernal impudence! The thing was to get rid of the bounder without creating a scene.

"You don't look insane, young man. Are you offering me a pleasantry?"

"No, Mr. Mansfield. I was never more serious."

"You have perhaps met me somewhere, and I have forgotten?"

"I have never met you before."

"You have met my daughter, then?"

"I have only seen her twice."

"Ah!" said Mansfield, as if this information cleared the air considerably. This was some kind of a joke, possibly a fool wager. Why not temporize and find out what lay behind this weird encounter?

"You might tell me something about yourself, before we proceed," he suggested.

The young man sensed the irony, the mockery. Two little points of fire appeared in his eyes.

"I am called Brandon Cathewe. By profession I am a writer." He hesitated for a moment. "I have a little money."

"A writer—with a little money. I should say that that was quite fortunate."

Suddenly there leaped into Mansfield's cold brain an idea, savage and ironic. Later he and Betty would have a hearty laugh over this idea. The impulent bounder!

"Brandon Cathewe," he mused. "That has an Irish lilt. So you wish to pay court to my daughter—object, matrimony!"

"With your permission."

"It is needless to ask if you are in love with my daughter."

"Quite needless. I am."

"The result of one meeting?"

"I have a happy faculty of knowing what I want."

"And of getting it?"—mockingly.

"Not always, to be sure, but generally. No doubt it sounds ridiculous to you; but the two times I have seen your daughter convince me that she is the one woman. Her beauty is the least of her."

An odd statement, thought Mansfield. "You have heard of the city of Bannister?"

"Very few people in America have not."

"Very good. I grant you permission to pay court to my daughter—conditionally. I'll waive my right to inquire about your family and your bank accounts. My terms are, Go to Bannister and make good; then come to me. I will introduce you personally to my daughter, provided she is not married by that time. Until you make good, you are not to seek to meet her. She is not to know that such a person as—er—Brandon Cathewe exists. I don't mean just making some money. By making good, I mean that you must become a force in Bannister. On the other hand, I am not going to keep my daughter locked up until you arrive. Those are the conditions," concluded Mansfield, very well pleased with himself.

"And I accept."

"You—what?"

"Accept! But on your part you must agree to give me fair play."

"Fair play?" Why, the bounder did not see the joke! "What do you mean by fair play?"

"You will say nothing to your daughter of this interview. I have come to you frankly and honorably, and I ask you measure for measure. If my conduct—my approach—seems outlandish, bizarre, it is because I am not afraid to ask for something I desire. I love your daughter, crazy as the statement may seem. I'm no fool. Your first impulse was to throw me over the rail. Being a gentleman, you reconsidered. You would punish my impertinence by placing insurmountable obstacles in front of me. I have accepted these conditions. If I fail, you will never hear of me. Good morning!"

The young man seized the companion-ladder rails and swung himself to the main deck without touching the steps. Immediately he disappeared.

> Can Brandon make the grade? What's he going to do? What will be his first move?

Skunk's Combat With Crows Unequal Match

How one skunk staged a battle with a flock of crows and was worsted by them on a floating cake of ice in Weiser river is told by a rancher living east of Welser, Idaho. His attention was attracted by the uproar of the crows and he watched the battle for some time, says the Milwaukee Journal.

The birds were apparently excited by the skunk's proximity. Occasionally a crow would lose control of itself and fall into the water and drown. As the ice floe floated nearer the battle grew in intensity.

The crows were fierce in their attacks but the skunk was just as fierce, using not only his claws but apparently also his poison gas equipment. He would dart his best weapon into the eyes of his assailants and there would be one less crow to combat.

Gas supplies finally gave out and the unequal battle ended when several of the birds alighted on the floe and picked out the skunk's eyes. As the floe drifted out of sight the skunk was stretched feebly on his side, with the crows picking vigorously at him. The rancher counted more than a dozen dead crows in the stream.

Glass Jug Lamp Base

A gallon glass cider jug makes a very good lamp base and with its handle is very easy to move about. the jug can be decorated on the inside to make it look unusual by pouring in for example a black paint and stirring it around vigorously. When this has dried, pour in a green paint and stir it around. The effect will be most attractive

Naked Truth

"This is a cynical world, when viewed through the eyes of the modern child," said David Starr Jordan. "Children have a way of presenting the truth about their elders with ghastly clarity.

"Quite recently, when I boarded a train in San Francisco, a family group took the two seats in front of me. They spent several minutes in adjusting themselves but at last were settled. At this moment the little girl of the family stuck her head out the window and said to a group of friends on the platform:

"'We'll be gone in a minute and then you can talk about us and we'll talk about you.'"

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

A Father Should Be Either Good Enough or Bad Enough

In Liverpool a man provided in his will that his son should inherit no part of his wine cellar, as he said, "for very good reasons."

That is all we know about the son or the father. Far be it from us to jump to blame, particularly to blame a parent for the fault of a child when we know no more about either than that the child has the shortcoming. However, we cannot escape something incongruous in a father having a well-stocked wine cellar and having to stipulate that his son is not to inherit it. The comment that springs to mind is that a man with a wine cellar should have taught his son how to use it, or, failing to do this, that he should not have had the wine cellar. The situation reflects badly on the effort he expended on his son or the example he set for him.

Except for the "newsy" nature of this case it is not nearly so unusual as it should be. Parents are all too prone to consider their responsibility to their children fulfilled when they have fed and clothed them and perhaps compelled them to attend Sunday school. They expect their children to do right and to form good habits as a matter of course, and if such wisdom does not descend upon them out of a clear sky and they do something harmful or disgraceful, the same parents feel themselves greatly wronged and ill-repaid for the tremendous effort they have given to make them turn out right.

If the problem of rearing children could be creditably disposed of in such a simple way, life would not be the complex matter it is. However, the world is becoming conscious of the fact that we owe a great deal more to our children than merely to enable them to exist and not to abuse them. We have brought them into a world filled with danger and temptation, more or less according to the equipment which we and our forbears have bequeathed them. It is our duty to arm them constructively against these dangers, to supply them with weapons to protect themselves against those elements in their environment which might constitute a danger.

It is not the "Do as I say" that is potent, but the "Do as I do!" And the great responsibility entailed by parenthood is to set the right example for our children, regardless of the personal sacrifice which this entails.

If a man simply is not equal to setting a good example for his son, there is one other way by which he can save him. That is by setting such a horrible example that his son's main ambition in life will be to be different from his father. With the man in Liverpool, who found it necessary to stipulate in his will that his son was not to have his wine cellar, the trouble is apparently that he was neither good enough nor bad enough to be of any use to the young man.

His Didn'ts

"Margaret, what made you turn down Hayden Carter?" a puzzled father inquired recently. "Wasn't he rich and rising enough to suit you? See all he's done already!"

"It wasn't his doings that bothered me," his daughter replied; "it was things he didn't do."

"I'd noticed always that he didn't make himself agreeable to most folks, but I thought it was just shyness he'd grow out of when he was better acquainted, till one day a decent-looking young man called 'Hello!' to him and he didn't answer—just looked savage for a minute."

"'That fellow seems to think he's got to speak to me every time we meet,' he growled. 'Went to school together, but he's just a bookkeeper; it doesn't get you anywhere to mix up with that kind of folks.'

"Another time we were passing the marsh road and on it a car was standing, loaded with women and children. The driver waved and called to Hayden, but he just speeded up his car.

"'Wants help, probably,' he remarked, 'but some hick'll come along and give 'em a boost. I never trouble trouble till trouble troubles me.'

"And you remember when Rita Randolph fell in her wonderful vaudeville act. It made me so sick that I got Hayden to bring me home—he wanted to stay through the program. But I wanted to do something for her—she's so brave—and I wrote a few words of sympathy and asked Hayden to send them with a box of roses—my treat, of course.

"Next night he pulled out that card—smashed!

"'Forgot all about it,' he laughed; 'I never can remember those little things.'

"It was then that I told him that our engagement was another little thing he could forget. I thought I'd better get out of trouble before it troubled me—worse."

And Margaret wasn't such a bad philosopher. Frequently people can be judged by their "didn'ts" perhaps better than by the things they do.

Drops on Water Make Music

Splashes of water are said to form small pockets in the water surfaces on which they fall, and these pockets act as resonating chambers, making a musical note whose pitch depends on the size of the pocket.

The Dinner for Four

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

(Copyright.)

THEY were both a trifle peevish as they made their way out with the throng. First, because it always annoyed Alice when the man she was engaged to admired so openly a girl so utterly different from herself. And secondly, George had come along to the matinee in his business car, a small delivery wagon, George being a traveling salesman. Which meant that Alice would drive back to Long Island in the front seat of the car—the inside was filled with George's samples—a thing which she detested, especially when she was all dolled up in her new white fur and powder blue hat.

"Dear, I don't see why you always make such a fuss about the car. I would have to go out to Long Island with it and come in again by train and that's a deuce of a bother—just to come in to the theater. And besides—if you took any interest in driving at all—you could be learning right now."

"And I've told you a thousand times that I haven't the slightest desire to drive."

To make matters worse the self-starter refused to do its duty. Being in just the slightest temper himself, he gave the crank handle a forceful jerk and a second later was holding his wrist while his face paled.

George might have made another attempt but for a girl who had watched the whole scene and who sprang forward to assist.

"Let me crank her," she said swiftly. "Please, I'm quite used to it. Here, let me see your wrist—nasty wrench, isn't it?" Quick as a flash, the strange girl had whipped out a great handkerchief and bound the wrist firmly.

George smiled into the girl's eyes. "You're a peach," he said fervently. "I don't know what I'm to do about driving. I hardly dare risk this city traffic with this stupid ache in my arm."

"I'm at your disposal if you need me. I've been a bit fed up without anything to drive since my boss is away on his vacation. I'm like a fish on Broadway without my hands on a wheel."

"Are you quite sure you're not saying this just to help a fellow out?" George searched her face, but she assured him it would be a great joy to drive him to Long Island.

After informal introductions all round George turned to Alice.

"Would you rather drive back with Miss Weller and let me go by train, or—"

"I'd far rather go by train—if you don't mind," said Alice, and dragging her feminine garments, in the way of white fox, about her slender neck she made off for the railroad station. She first, however, made certain that the fine diamond ring on Miss Weller's finger indicated that she had already found the man of her choice.

"This is the first time I've ever been driven in my own car. By jove, it seems funny—but rather a nice change," George said as he watched the girl swing neatly in and out of the vast line of traffic. "I don't know what I can do for the next week or two while this wrist's mending. I've got to drive my car and I can't very well do it. Is there a chance that you would be free for a while yet?"

"Delighted. But will the little lady not object?"

"Can't help it if she does—business is business and I am not in a position to lose customers—at this stage of the game. What about your fiance."

"Tom doesn't interfere in anything I want to do. He spouts to me about the moon and all I'm thinking about at those moments is how long it would take to get there in a sixty-mile-an-hour car. Tom doesn't know a magneto from a steering wheel.

"Neither does Alice," laughed George and edged just the least bit closer to the firm arm that guided his car. "What about a cup of tea?"

"Far rather have coffee," laughed Miss Weller and drew up at the next tiny tea room that dotted the roadway.

"We have spent just one hour and a half having coffee," said Miss Weller as they emerged to take up the trail.

"And a good thing, too—it's done my wrist a world of good. I wouldn't mind stopping at another a few miles on." Again he turned frankly toward her. "Business is going to be a grand and glorious pleasure while you drive for me. "I'll bet I'll sell more than I have during the past ten months. I say," he burst out suddenly, "what are we going to do about this?"

"About what?" she asked, and her heart gave a great thump.

"You know very well what," he said tenderly, and also a bit desperately. "You and I are engaged to the wrong ones. Do you think there's a chance in the world that if we arrange a little dinner for four that your Tom and my Alice would forget us and take to each other? From what you've said of Tom I fancy he's exactly the type of man to make Alice supremely happy."

"I like that. What about me?"

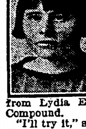
"I'm the type to do that, and what's more ten Alices and fifteen Toms aren't going to keep me from doing it."

Miss Weller very nearly swerved into the ditch, but being of a decidedly level-headed nature all she said was, "If we turn sharp right at this crossing it will take us seven miles out of our way and there's an adorable tea room—"

"Turn sharp right," said George.

HUSBAND DID THE WASHING

His Wife Confined to Her Bed by Ill Health



Because of his wife's frequent ill health, Mr. J. F. Gage was obliged to do the washing and cooking for the family.

One day when Mrs. Gage was confined to her bed, he brought her the newspaper to read. Among the advertisements she noticed a letter from another sick woman telling of the help she had received from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I'll try it," she decided.

Her husband brought home a bottle and only a few days after she had begun to take it she felt well enough to be up around the house. Gradually her general health improved until she is now able to do her own work.

In a letter which Mrs. Gage recently wrote, she said, "I have taken twelve bottles and feel like a new woman." She has told many women about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and one of her friends is now taking it. Her address is Mrs. J. F. Gage, Route 5, Brownwood, Texas.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been taken by women for more than half a century with very satisfactory results.

Insist That Frogs Arrived in Deluge

The government meteorological office in Washington gave scant credence to those Danville residents who said that it rained frogs. Officials said there had been several similar reports previously, but none of them had been proved.

North Danville residents, on the other hand, pointed to millions of black frogs as large as a man's finger-nail hopping about Bryant avenue. Small boys with cans and buckets collected them by the thousands. In some cases the frogs were shoveled from porches and walks. At six o'clock in the evening there were no frogs in sight. Following a tropical deluge at that hour, lasting a half hour, the streets and yards of that section of the city were thick with them. One theory was that the tiny frogs were brought out of hiding places by the heavy rain, but this was held unlikely by the absence of trees on the street.—Washington Post.

LOVE AT THE WINDOW

By GRACE ETHEL RANSOM

(©, by W. G. Chapman.)

I HAVE fallen into the habit of dating everything in my life from the time of my crippling accident.

When I was a little girl, some years before my accident, I used to see the young fellow at the window of the adjacent house. The family had just moved in, but we did not know each other. In large towns this is often the way. I suppose we were interested in each other, as a boy and girl are apt to be, but if we glanced at each other it was with an aspect of unconcern, the mere casual look that one bestows upon a stranger.

I am three years older than Madge, my sister, and it always behooved me to set her a good example. Perhaps on that account I was especially anxious that she should not see me exchange glances with the boy at the window opposite. And Madge was always the beauty, while I am plain, what I could do Madge must not do without more serious consequences.

The house was ours. Our parents had died when we were small, and an aunt came to live with us and take charge. When she died I was twenty-two and Madge nineteen. We stayed on in the house, but our annuity was a tiny one. There was just enough money used to talk about our future. Of course we both expected to be married.

"If I marry first," said Madge, "you will come and live with us until you marry."

"Who would marry an ugly duckling like me?" I asked, though in my heart I knew some day the man would come.

Madge was indignant with me. She always saw me through the glasses of love. But beside Madge I was a black little dwarf. Madge had one of those saints' faces, and a wealth of golden hair that made her wonderful. If we had been like other girls—I mean, used to social life—her admirers would have been innumerable.

All this while the family had lived next door. We had come to know them slightly. Roger, the young man, was away at college. We had not seen him for years.

Then came the accident. It was a fall from our car in a collision, and when I recovered consciousness I was lying at home in my own bed, and the room was darkened. Before me sat Madge. She told me I was getting better, after three weeks of terrifying unconsciousness.

The days passed and I felt stronger. I wondered why the look of pain remained on Madge's face. At last they told me. I should never be able to walk without crutches again.

For a whole year I was an invalid. One day a famous visiting surgeon passed through our town. He spent four hours here, and two of them were at my beside. Madge had brought him, pleading that he should come and examine me. He shook his head frankly when he had completed the examination.

"There is one man who can replace the knee in the socket, and that is Ochs of Vienna," he said. "It has been tried in our hospitals, but never successfully. He has a special technic for repairing the atrophied ligaments. You must go to him if you wish to get well."

When he was gone Madge and I stared at each other in dismay. Even if the great surgeon were willing to operate for nothing, it was impossible to go to Vienna unless—we sold the house!

"We'll sell it," said Madge.

Of course I refused, and that was the beginning of our first big quarrel. For days Madge went about with a sullen face. But I would not give way. How could I jeopardize our future, her future, in order to get my knee straightened?

Finally we arrived at a compromise. The house should be sold—after Madge married. Then, if she married well, we could afford the sacrifice. I could live on less than two needed, and the knee could wait. The surgeon had said that. It could wait three years before it was too late to operate. Madge must get married within three years.

"I hope it won't be that long, Jenny," she said, as she kissed me in reconciliation.

Soon after that the young man began to appear at the window opposite again.

My invalid chair was by the window. I could no longer help seeing him when he was there. The initiative had, so to speak, passed out of my hands.

One day a great surprise awaited me. Madge had struck up a friendship with the boy next door. After that he used to venture to smile at me, and I smiled back. Madge had told me that he wanted to be introduced to me; meanwhile I felt that we were practically acquainted.

It is surprising what new interests an invalid acquires. I used to watch him through the window, as he sat writing at his table. He meant to be an author, Madge told me, and, having a little income of his own, he would not be driven to the expedient of writing trash for a livelihood. He hoped to do something big some day.

"But, Jenny," she said, "when are you going to let me bring him up to see you? You are always making excuses."

I made another excuse; but after she had gone I realized the nature of my selfishness. I was jealous of Madge.

Yes, that was it. I could not bear that my lameness, my homeliness should be contrasted with my sister's glorious beauty. Madge was prettier than ever. The boy next door spent a good deal of time in her company. Sometimes they walked down the street together. I fancied that people would be talking about them; I was sure they were going to announce their engagement soon.

And intsead of being happy I was jealous and miserable. Perhaps the morbid fancies of a sick woman may mitigate such a crime. But a temptation was stirring in my heart, and it was this: If Madge married the boy at the window I would refuse to sell the house and go to Vienna. I would never allow her marriage with the man I loved to be the price of my physical redemption.

The man I loved! Yes, I did not disguise it from myself any longer. In my childhood days it was I who had discovered the boy at the window. It was I who had shown him to Madge, and he was mine by the right of priority, and by the right of my love.

I could love him even though we had never exchanged a word. For the first time in my life I hated Madge. I passed through all the variations of emotion possible as I sat at the window in my invalid's chair.

I think my mind had become a little distorted, for sometimes the violence of my hate frightened me. I was helpless—I was so helpless, and all the while I had to smile and pretend to be happy. I know Madge began to grow frightened; sometimes I would see her eyes bent on mine in the queerest way.

"Jenny," she said to me one day, "I am going to tell you a secret—not now, but some time. I think—" A pause. She looked at me with that happy smile that charmed every one, but now filled my heart with black hatred and impotent rage. And I smiled back, and felt like an assassin.

"I shall tell you," she said, "when you let me bring Harry to see you. No, not then, but afterward."

Harry! She had blurted out the name involuntarily.

"You need not trouble," I whispered, clenching my hands under the rug until the physical pain was intolerable. "You need not tell me."

Madge looked at me in pain. "How strange you are, lately, Jenny," she said. "But I am going to tell you. When can I bring him?"

The wild pain at my heart demanded respite. Let me get the thing over. "Bring him at once!" I cried.

Madge was gone, and I was waiting at the window in my invalid chair. I saw her cross the street. She went freely into the house now. I watched till they came out together. His arm was linked in hers, and they were laughing. What a fool they had made of me!

It seemed an eternity before Madge came into the room. She laughed uncomfortably, I thought.

"You know Harry Tremont," she said with embarrassment. "He has wanted so much to see you."

"We are old friends," said Harry, taking my burning palm in his cool hands.

I don't know how the interview came to an end. But it was ended at last, and suddenly I could bear it no more. Harry was gone and Madge was kneeling at my side, and I was crying in her arms. And I was blurting out all my secret story of shame and misery.

Why, Madge's face was like an angel's as she raised it, and the tears in her eyes made them shine with exaltation greater than anything I have ever seen.

"Jenny! Did you think that?" she whispered. "Why, you goose, it was you all the time—always you. Harry told me he loved you ever since he was a little boy and used to see you at the window!"

I can walk like other people now, and we still live in the old house—Harry and I and the little girl who has been named after Madge. Madge comes to see us often. She is happy with her husband. Sometimes a shade of jealousy touches my heart to see them together, for I learned to be very jealous of love in those days of sickness. But then I think of Madge's face that day, and I know that no other love can ever dim hers and mine.

Great Work That of Training Child Mind

If an Agassiz finds pleasure in digging among fossils in order that he may interpret the great story of prehistoric life; if a John Thoreau by Walden pond is delighted with his studies of bugs and beetles; if a John Burroughs on his little patch of ground in the valley of the Mohawk glories in his life among the birds and bees; if a Luther Burbank is enraptured with his work of transforming a worthless desert cactus into an edible fruit, or in producing sweeter rose or fairer lily; if these and other workers, whose names are legion, revel in the love of their work—then by what term shall we designate the joy that should be the teacher's who works not with mere fossils, nor with bugs or beetles, nor with birds, bees or flowers, but with the child who is at once the most complex, the most plastic, the most beautiful, the most wonderful of all God's creation? Yes, it's a wonderful thing to be a teacher; it's a great thing to teach school—Frank E. Simmons in the Educational Review.

Galli-Curci Swayed by the Seer of Sweden

Emanuel Swedenborg, Scientist and Theologian
Amalita Galli-Curci
Clarence W. Barron, Financial Authority

Prima Donna Gives Wonderful Interpretation of the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg—

HENRY FORD'S Dearborn Independent publishes a remarkable article on Galli-Curci and Emanuel Swedenborg, by Clarence W. Barron of the Wall Street Journal, the world famous financial authority.

Mr. Barron declares that Galli-Curci has the most wonderful brain he has ever met or heard of in a woman, although she is much more "a true woman with a life and soul of affection for all that is ennobling and uplifting in the family, and in color, form, and music."

Mr. Barron is chairman of the Rotch Trustees, who acting under the will of Lydia S. Rotch of New Bedford, Mass., began in 1872 a modern translation of the Theological Works which Emanuel Swedenborg wrote and published in the Latin tongue, and deposited in the libraries of the world 150 years ago.

This work was completed and published by the Houghton Mifflin Co. in 32 volumes in 1907.

About three years ago there appeared in a Cleveland paper a paragraph that among her other accomplishments Galli-Curci had read all the Theological Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg. The claim seamed so absurd to Mr. Barron that he thought it might be easily punctured by a simple inquiry as to the edition.

The Bible a Greater Work Than Ever

To Mr. Barron's direct inquiry Madame Galli-Curci promptly replied: "Yes, I have read in the past year the complete Swedenborg Works, in fact it is the Rotch Edition of the Houghton Mifflin Co. that I have.

"I can say certainly that the Bible to me is a greater work than it was before."

Mr. Barron says: "My astonishment was intensified. Familiar over many years with Swedenborg's general theological writings, I had set out to read the entire thirty-two volumes preparatory to an advertising campaign for the sale of this edition. Reading a few pages each day I finished my self-imposed task in fourteen years. I shall probably finish a second reading, at my present rate of progress, in perhaps ten years. Was it possible that a woman with no previous knowledge or relation to these books had really intelligently read them within a year?"

Swedenborg's Writings

Mr. Barron continues: "As an economist, writing state papers on weights, measures, coinages and currencies, Swedenborg is easily comprehended. As an engineer transporting ships overland he is easily visualized. As a government official in the great mining industry of Sweden, writing practical books on mining and smelting, declared to be the foundation of modern metallurgy, he is of interest in the encyclopedia of scientific history. As the writer of volumes—original studies in search for the human soul—he is not without human interest.

"But when one comes to the realm of the unseen, where there is neither time nor space upon which to rest mental conceptions, few may enter into the fullness of the revelation which has come into the libraries of the world through Emanuel Swedenborg.

"Think of twenty modern-sized volumes, originally written in the Latin tongue and unfolding from the Hebrew of 'Genesis' and 'Exodus' the internal or spiritual sense that lies beneath the letter. Annex a dozen more similar volumes that not only expound every picture set forth in the book of 'Revelation' as conveyor of a tremendous truth of universal application throughout invisible degrees of creation and life, but also illumine all the problems of sex as presented throughout the universe from the union of the love and wisdom in the divine down to sex crystallization in the mineral kingdom; include the deepest of all works ever written entitled, in the original Latin, 'Angelic Wisdom Concerning the Divine Love and the Divine Wisdom.' Then answer to yourself the number of years that ought to be required to master these thirty-two volumes"

Mean More Than Any Other Books

Mr. Barron, still credulous, continued his correspondence with Madame Galli-Curci for some months. He learned that soon after she lost her dear mother she had sought the Writings of Swedenborg in a desire to know more about the other world whence her mother had gone. She spent the entire summer vacation studying Swedenborg's Works, and declared: "They have meant, and mean more to me than anything else I have ever read."

When Galli-Curci returned from California Mr. Barron motored up into the Catskills to her beautiful Italian palace, and in an afternoon with her and her husband, Mr. Homer Samuels, he was convinced that Galli-Curci had read and devoured Swedenborg in a briefer period than anybody had ever done before.

He says of this interview:

"Hours flew like minutes. I wasn't the questioner. Mr. and Mrs. Samuels were at me with the sharpest and deepest questions. They seemed in perfect harmony mentally and spiritually, as in their work in music.

Wanted to Learn

"She wanted to know about the 'Grand Man'. I told her it would be easier to comprehend it if she would forego the idea of time and space and consider, as Swedenborg says in 'The Apocalypse Explained', that every society in the heavens connects with some organ of the human body and helps to sustain it. Therefore the heavens have the organization of the 'Grand Man', but we need not think of it as a shape or figure.

"'Yes,' exclaimed her husband, 'I see it; it is organization.' I explained, also, how the 'Psalms' likewise connected with every society of the heavens, and how the world within and without was knit together in one grand poem and song of creation, man in the image of his Maker and knit into Him through the heavens, from which he has life in every organ of his body.

Swedenborg's 32 Volumes Read in a Single Summer

"'Now I understand,' she said, and asked me for explanation of other things. Her intelligent questions, as well as her statements, left no manner of doubt that Galli-Curci had performed the stupendous feat of reading the thirty-two volumes of Swedenborg in a single summer season. She declared 'Heaven and Hell' a very attractive and popular title and concerns that about which people are most eager to know; but it is not one of Swedenborg's great works; although it makes a good popular and introductory work."

A Help in Her Work

Galli-Curci understands the writings of Swedenborg even better than theologians, because she puts them into practice in the broadest life of loving helpfulness.

She said that Swedenborg had helped her in her work. She had no longer to think of herself but of her audiences, and let the music flow through her: regard herself just a medium for life to pour through. She felt with and for her audiences, and singing was no effort for her.

All Fear Vanishes

"The more you do—the more you give forth—the more life and energy is poured into you, and you are stronger and not weaker for the doing, the working and the singing. I always feel stronger; I am not exhausted at all by my singing. Swedenborg shows the reason and how life comes in as you pour it forth usefully to others. You don't have to try worry or fret. You know it is not you but that it is just being done through you."

Speaking further of the help Swedenborg had been to her in her work she said: "One gets so much more confidence. The other world and the one life, that comprehends all life, becomes reality and all fear and worry vanish."

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, September 10, 1926. Volume 16; Number 19.

NEW CREAMERY TO BE BUILT AT LANCASTER

At a recent meeting of the stockholders, of the Lancaster Creamery Association is was decided to build a new creamery. It has for some time been apparent that a new building is necessary to take care of the constantly growing business of this institution. The selection of the site and other matters pertaining to building was left to the judgment of the board of directors. It is very likely however that the new building will be located on Central avenue. Every creamery built in the last ten years in this part of the state has been located in the most prominent and favorable location in town that could be available. So far there has been nothing definite decided as to the size and arrangement of the new building but it has been estimated that it will cost between $12,000 and $15,000.

Faculty of the Holt Public School and Members of the School Board Banqueted Monday night

The banquet given Monday evening by the local unit of the Wemans Christian Temperance Union in honor of our school faculty and members of the school board was a decided success.

The principal speakers were Mrs. J. M. Bishop, of Thief River Falls, State Chairman of the Child Welfare Board, and recently elected President of the State Auxiliary of American Legion, and W. O. Braggans, our worthy County Attorney of Marshall County. The former spoke on Child Welfare and its importance. She left some real information regarding the children of today, facts that some of us perhaps have known yet not taken seriously.

The latter discussed the Eighteenth Amendment with credit to himself and community. Mr. Braggans said that there is a large number of people that do not beleive in the Eighteenth Amendment, yet they are honorable people and uphold the law as long as it is written into our Constitution. He further stated that the people that to not try to uphold the Amendment are not honorable citizens. He also brought out the importance of assisting your County Officials in trying to enforce the law rather than assisting the law breaker.

Both speakers emphatically stated that through education is the means of bettering conditions in the community and country at large, which can best be accomplished through the teachers of schools. With this thought in mind let us begin our new school year right.

HUNTING SEASON OPENS THURSDAY

Next Thursday morning, Sept. 16th, the duck hunting season will open with a bang, and will continue to bang until December 31st.

The ducks are not so plentiful in this part of the county this year as they were last year, because the Mud Lake bottom is dry. But just wait till the ducks come south that have spent the summer in Canada where it is wet, get a peep at the pot hole which some call Thief Lake, and also the gang that is going to be there to try and keep them from starving to death by shooting all they can each day during the season. Then is when we will get ours easy, as by the time they get here they will be used to the war and won't mind getting shot.

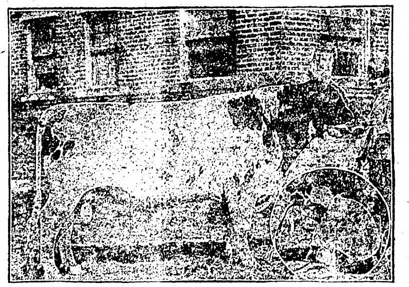
Selection of Dairy Cattle Breeds Influenced by Shows



A good typical Ayrshire sire
Putting on the finishing touches

Many a man who is undecided as to the breed of dairy cattle that he will select has been influenced in making his decision by the animals of a particular breed that he has seen in public.

The individual breeder secures a great deal of advertising as the result of exhibiting at fairs, or in offering good animals at public sales. It gives people a chance to see and know the kind of stock that a man is breeding and paves the way for future business.

It is essential that special care and attention be given dairy animals far in advance of the time that they are to be exhibited or sold. Exhibiting or selling animals publicly in their every day clothes is poor advertising and puts them at a disadvantage when the competition is keen. It takes several weeks to put a dairy animal in good show condition and what applies to fitting for show applies as well to fitting for sale.

It is important that the dairy animal to be exhibited or sold be in good flesh. A good covering of flesh adds to size, increases [illegible] and indicates that the animal is thrifty and in good health. Dairy animals being fitted need extra feed.

Stabling and blanketing are great aids in putting the hair and hide in condition. By stabling in summer, the animal is protected from the hot sun which makes the hide harsh and stiff to the touch. A roomy box stall that is kept clean and well bedded provides desirable quarters. Continuous blanketing helps keep the animal clean, sweats the hide, thus improving its handling qualities and makes the hair lay to the body. The blanket need not be expensive but it must be tied on securely.

Every dairy animal that is to be exhibited should have the hair clipped from the entire body about three weeks previous to the date of the show or sale. This will get rid of the old hair and allow a new, even growth to develop which will greatly improve the appearance and increase the selling value of the animal.

A point often overlooked in the preparation of a dairy animal for show or sale is that of training to lead and stand properly. An untrained animal cannot display its good points to advantage if it combats the efforts of the attendant to exhibit it properly. A little time spent each day in training to handle properly will save effort and embarrassment at the show or sale and increase the financial return.

While in the show or sale ring, the man in charge of an animal should have one main thought in mind, namely that of showing the animal to advantage. By this is meant that when it stands, its feet are properly placed, back straight and head alert. Any movement on the part of the attendant or animal should be as graceful as possible. Until the ribbons are placed or the auctioneer's hammer falls, take no chances.

WHAT THE FEDERAL RESERVE HAS DONE FOR BUSINESS

What the Federal Reserve System has done for business is summed up in these points: it has (1) given business greater confidence in the ability of the banks to care for credit needs; (2) introduced an elastic currency and eliminated money panics; (3) eliminated extreme seasonal fluctuations in rates of interest; (4) brought business safely through the war and post-war crises; (5) saved millions of dollars to business through its efficient system for check collection; (6) made the gold reserve more effective as a basis for credit extension in times of extraordinary demand; (7) aided in the financing of foreign and domestic trade by developing a discount market for acceptances; (8) provided a means for handling huge financial operations of the government without interference with business; (9) aided in the re-establishment of the gold standard abroad; (10) given us an experienced banking organization which will assist us in meeting the future exigencies of business at home and abroad with courage and confidence.

RAIN DELAYS THRESHING

Heavy rains which fell here last Thursday night and continued till about Friday noon has put all threshing outfits to a standstill in this community. On Monday afternoon a few machines commenced to pound out the grain, and on Tuesday nearly all tee rigs around here were humming. There are more rigs in this community than usual this year and with favorable weather threshing would soon be finished.

STORY FROM THE START

Brandon Cathewe, a young writer, returning from Europe to America, falls in love with Betty, daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield, steel magnate of the town of Bannister. Cathewe asks permission to court Betty, to whom he has not been introduced and has never spoken to, and Mansfield, in a spirit of sardonic humor, tells the young man he must first become a "force" in Bannister, and that until he has done so he must avoid Betty. The youth accepts the conditions.

Lord of Polygon Hill.

Across the shining threads of steel—the railway yard—a man ran lightly, with the sure foot of the athlete. He wore a blue checkered mackinaw and a woolen cap pulled down over his ears. Behind lay a sinister outline; giant furnace doors opening and closing, blinding rivulets of molten metal. Men, with the aspect of demons, flitted past these luminous backgrounds.

Beyond the runner stood rows of forlorn tenements, evidently his objective. He was in a hurry. At any moment a mile-long freight might cut him off. When at length he leaped across the last rail he was fairly well spent.

At the curb—to be precise, the ditch—in front of one of the tenements, before which ran a crumbling tar walk, stood a two-seated runabout, rusty and battered, but as faithful as a mongrel dog.

In the city of Bannister this ramshackle vehicle was as familiar to the sight as the police-van and the fire engines. You were quite as likely to see it reposing impudently before some handsome mansion on Polygon hill as here in Poverty row, where, in truth, it seemed more at home.

The man in the mackinaw pushed his way into the hall of the tenement, climbed four gloomy flights of stairs and entered a forlorn room. In a window a newspaper served as a pane of glass. The surviving panes were dim with cobwebs.

At the side of a dilapidated iron bed sat a man in a fur-lined overcoat. He was Dr. Maddox, hale and hearty at sixty, white of hair and ruddy of countenance.

On the bed, under a tattered sheet, there was a body, sinisterly rigid in outline.

"Dead?" asked the man in the mackinaw.

"Yes, son. He was dead when I got back from telephoning you."

"I came as fast as I could. How did it happen?"

"He was old and slow, and got in the way of a swinging crane. There wasn't a whole bone in his body."

"Could he talk?"

"He mumbled something about the seventh plank from the west wall, naming you. What's your interest in him? He wasn't a Bannister man."

"Human."

The young man walked over to the west wall, counted off six planks in the floor, and pried back the seventh.

From the cavity he extracted a bundle of papers. "Doctor, do you know what doubled Mansfield's fortune after the war began?"

"What?"

"Those barb-wire machines. The dead man on the bed there was the inventor. These papers are the documents in the case. Is there nothing sinister in the fact that he lies there dead? Why should he be doing manual labor at three dollars a day, working at a kind of charity job, when he should have had all the comforts of life? Think of him, dying in bitterness like that! Eighteen dollars a week, with the music of his own creation in his ears, day after day, and another man taking all the profits!"

"You mean he was cheated and robbed?"

"Legally, no; morally, yes!"

"Brandon, have you anything personally against Dunleigh Mansfield?" asked the doctor.

"I hadn't when I came here to take charge of the Herald," answered Cathewe, as we know the man in the mackinaw. "I came to Bannister upon an almost unbelievable adventure. Some day I may tell you about that. No; at the start I had nothing against Mansfield. But for three years I've done nothing but stumble over cases like this; mean and contemptible, cold-blooded, but always within the law. What's the object in piling up more gold? He can't count his millions. He doesn't need money, and yet he robs a man like this!"

"What are you going to do—print this story?" asked the doctor, indicating the poor, broken thing on the bed.

"Yes! I've known all along what kind of a man Mansfield was. But I dared not attack him until I'd made the paper go. Now I can start the guns. Before I'm through I promise to render Mansfield impotent for future harm. I have facts, facts! My audience has learned to trust me; and they'll believe the Herald. I am going to protect these poor human beings who don't know how to fight for their rights."

"He will break you. What can you do against his tremendous power, which reaches from here to Washington?"

"I can speak the truth and back it up with incontrovertible facts."

"Mansfield has a daughter who believes him to be a demigod—as mine believes me to be."

"Ah, but you are one! Nancy Maddox has a right to believe that. But Mansfield's daughter! What is she but an inconsequent butterfly?"

"She is young. In judging her you may be a little hasty. Nancy, who is visiting her in Washington, says she is lovely and lovable."

"I was wondering what had become of Nancy. Miss Mansfield will improve. She can't help it, and be with Nancy Maddox."

The doctor's eyes sparkled. If only this odd, clean boy and his Nancy might fall in love with each other!

"Doctor, what would you say if I told you I was a man with three names?" asked Cathewe as they left the house.

"What? Three names?"

"Yes. My own and two others."

"What's the joke, son?"

For a block Cathewe remained silent. "After all, a doctor is like a priest—the repository of secrets. One more don't hurt you. I am going to talk to you as to the family physician."

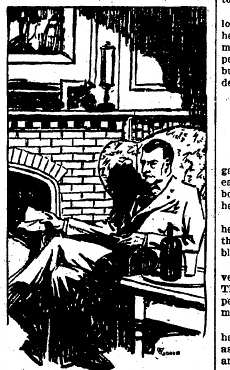
"It is nothing I ought not to know?"

"I am not a fugitive from justice."

"I beg your pardon, son!"

"But I'm a kind of Ishmael. I am pursued by the Furies. I am in the same category as a ship beset by a typhoon—a victim. Three names. I have an assumed one. By that name I make a modest living, honorably. Brandon Cathewe are my given names, the tail of the kite, which is Hallowell. Have you ever by chance heard of Digby Hallowell?"

The doctor repeated the name ruminatingly. "Seems I've heard the name somewhere, but it escapes me at this moment."



Of What Was He Afraid.

"You will recall it with a little digging," said the young man. "And when you do, remember I'm Digby Hallowell's son and my mother is his widow. Here we are. Thanks for the lift. When you pick the Herald off your doorstep tomorrow morning, you'll see some interesting facts relative to Dunleigh Mansfield, 'the Lord of Polygon Hill,' I'll call him! That will make a good catch phrase!"

* * * * * * *

When Dunleigh Mansfield greeted his daughter and Nancy Maddox in his Washington home his face was expressive of pleasure and amiability. "I shall have to leave you two after dinner," he said. "I am expecting to wind up a contract. You are not afraid to ride about alone?"

"The dark," said Nancy, "has no terrors for either of us. It all depends upon what you read."

"And what do you read?" asked Mansfield, who was really a fine scholar.

"Good books, books about human beings who are striving to better themselves. I like that 'Prosaic Lives.' The author wrote from his heart."

Mansfield picked up the book from the table. "A green young man. It is quite patent that he wrote from his heart, not from a brain that had gathered the facts first-hand and sifted false ideals from the true. A good book, a worth-while book, must be the result of a nicely balanced brain and heart. If you let the heart dictate, you generally invite trouble. It is as if a soldier were giving orders to his general. A well-written book, but green."

"But what an odd name to assume!" Betty balanced the book on her palm.

"George Cottar; Kipling's Brush Boy. And there you are," declared her father. "A dreamer, not a doer; a dweller in a fairyland of his own making, observing life through roseate clouds!"

"But what would we do in this world if there weren't any Brushwood Boys?" asked Nancy. "Don't we all make believe at one time or another? Do you mean to tell me that you've never built any dreams?"

"Oh, when I was a youngster, probably—the kind of dreams you mean. I have my dreams all right; but they come to me in the form of blue-prints. And I have the advantage over your George Cottar, for my dreams come true."

"Didn't his?" said Betty, softly.

"But that's a story only. It happened in a book," and Mansfield started for the hall.

* * * * * * *

People in Bannister, on the morrow, when they picked up the Bannister Herald off the front steps, sensed a shock, at once pleasurable and sorrowful. By noon the whole city was aware of the fact that Mansfield had been boldly and skillfully assailed in his castle-keep.

Between the counsel for the Mansfield interests in Bannister and Mansfield himself there were exchanged a series of brief telegrams. An excerpt of the story had been telegraphed to Washington.

From Washington: "Is it blackmail? Give the editor a scare."

From Bannister: "No blackmail. He won't scare. Have seen his proofs. We can't do anything through courts."

From Washington: "Buy the sheet."

From Bannister: "Editor says it is not for sale."

From Washington: "What is editor's name?"

When Mansfield received the answer to this query, he was in his study.

Impatiently he ripped open the yellow envelope and drew out—Medusa's head! Anyhow, he stared at the sheet, motionless and stonily, in a kind of petrified astonishment. He had all but forgotten the man and the incident.

"Brandon Cathewe!"

CHAPTER III

Mansfield Plans Reprisal.

That fellow, that impertinent beggar Cathewe, had taken a joke in earnest! Gone to Bannister and bought a newspaper! But why was he turning his cannon upon him?

Dunleigh Mansfield wondered. If he wanted Betty, why attack the father in this manner? The infernal blackguard!

Of course he had purchased the invention outright, at an absurd figure. That was merely good business. A perfectly legal business deal; the moral side of it was negligible.

Spite, probably! Young Cathewe had suddenly realized that Betty was as far out of his reach as the stars, and had now embarked upon a campaign of spite.

The young anarchist must be suppressed before he made any headway. Mansfield must find out how long the fool had been in Bannister and what success he was making of the sheet. Actually gone to Bannister to become a "force!"

Betty, however, must know nothing; the scurrilous sheet must not fall into her hands! It was perfectly legitimate business; but the young woman had odd ideas in her head.

Soon she would be returning to Bannister. He did not want her to go back there at all, but there was apparently no visible method by which he could dissuade her.

Why didn't he want her to go back? That puzzled him. Of what was he afraid? That in returning to Bannister she might eventually learn that her father was not quite the demigod she pictured him?

Well, he would have Cathewe out of the way before she did return. His only concern was that she might stumble upon something in type.

Very few in Bannister would dare whisper even that Dunleigh Mansfield was not always scrupulous.

There existed, though, a human being who could embark upon such an enterprise as that he had named as a condition to wooing Betty, who could accept conditions which would have wrinkled the brow of the young Hercules.

You've learned his second name. When is he going to use the third?

Woman's Rights Well Established in Tibet

Marriage in Tibet is not the least interesting of the customs of that remarkable country, writes an exploring globe-trotter in a British paper, reported by the Atlanta Constitution. As a rule it takes place only in families possessed of wealth and social position. According to the laws of Tibet, the eldest brother has the first right to marry, since he alone inherits the ancestral property. But if there are brothers the bride is shared by them as by so many junior husbands. On the day of the wedding the bride is barricaded in her home. Long arguments, in which the whole village takes a part, over the profitableness of the marriage are indulged in through a hole in the door. Finally a scarf is waved, as a sign of surrender and the gates are opened. The bridegroom's mother then hands out sour milk and cakes to the guests and the ceremonies begin. The Tibetan woman is very much the head of the household. The men must bring their earnings to her. When they need money they must ask for it. A husband who is idle too long is liable to be reprimanded or even divorced and driven away.

HOW MANY WOMEN GET UP SINGING

Two Women Find Health Essential to Happiness

MRS. BELLE THOMPSON
ROUTE 2, ROSSVILLE, GEORGIA

Springtime streamed in through the open windows. The green fields of Georgia were basking in the sunshine. Somewhere a bird was trilling. It was a day to be happy.

But the pale woman at the table sighed and pushed away her plate. Nothing tasted right. She couldn't eat much. She couldn't sleep well, either. She was so weak, it was hard to do her work. When the baby cried, she wanted to cry, too.

She had not been well for four years. Her husband watched her with a man's helpless expression. But his mother knew a remedy.

"My mother-in-law," says Mrs. Belle Thompson, Route 2, Rossville, Ga., "told me of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Lydia E. Pinkham's Sanative Wash. I took six bottles of the Vegetable Compound. I could sleep and would get up in the morning singing and feeling fine. I am the mother of three children, and always after the babies came I had to take treatments, but I can truly say that this last time I have only used the Sanative Wash. It does more good than the treatments. It keeps me on my feet to care for my children and I do most of my work. I feel it my duty to let you know how both of the medicines have helped me."

Another Happy Woman

Decatur, Illinois.—"I took your medicine for weakness. I would sometimes have to hold myself up with my hands. I was this way for five years, off and on. I read in the newspapers where Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped a lot of women, and I thought I would take it. I am now getting better so fast that every month I can feel a difference. My work now is cooking. If you like, you may use these facts as a testimonial. I am willing to help you boost your medicine."—MRS. IRENE REED, 635 Greenwood Ave., Decatur, Ill.

On Her Matinee Job

By JOHN EVANS

(Copyright.)

JUNE AIKEN was facing, for the first time in her life, the necessity for helping to earn the family income. Gradually the father's salary was becoming insufficient for the needs of the household and children and June began to look about for something to do.

It was seldom that June was discouraged but today she felt blue and the outlook was anything but cheerful. Nothing her mother could say gave her a lighter view of the future, and she picked up her hat and said she would go out and try to walk off her doldrums.
